There were some worthy, honest and hard-working people among this careless, happy-go-lucky lot of ex-slaves of Tennessee, whose lives were rendered miserable by the other men and women, who drank, caroused and defied all the laws of decent living.

The place became a stench in the nostrils of good Topekans, until it was realized that something must be done for the redemption of these poor ignorant people. This was finally and fully accomplished through the efforts of Rev. Chas. M. Sheldon and the Central Church of Topeka, of which he has been pastor since 1889. In 1892 Dr. Sheldon began the study of the problems of different classes of people in the city, his church giving him a vacation for this purpose. He studied the life of the doctor, going the rounds of calls and attending lectures, and endeavoring in every way to put himself in the physician's place. The same course was pursued with other professional men, with railroad men and college students.

A part of this experiment consisted in a first-hand study of the colored settlement so near his church. It was Dr. Sheldon's opinion that there was need of much larger work than was being done by a few workers in the Sunday School held in the little church in the colored community.

Church Where Kindergarten School is Held

Pastor Sheldon succeeded in arousing interest, not only in his own church members, but among other influential residents of Topeka. At this period many of the colored people who had originally migrated from their native State were gone, some dead and others removed to new territories. A second generation had grown up and were raising still a third. Dr. Sheldon began his work with these children, establishing a kindergarten, which soon became a source of delight to the dusky little youngsters, taking them off the street and from the evil communications which corrupt good manners of any child, black or white.

Then the wise man bethought himself of a plan to get at the grown people through their pride. Prizes were offered for the best kept and most productive gardens, for the most neatly kept yard, grounds and alley, and for the place on which the most improvement was made during the season; also for best improvements on buildings and fences; for cleanest and neatest kept house inside; for best lot of flower-beds in front yard; for best lot of roses, and for best exhibit of fruit trees and vines planted that season. Previous to this, at a meeting held in the church to consider this plan, Mr. Sheldon had pointed out fearlessly and plainly to the people the needs and defects of the town. The church was filled with colored people, who seemed quite in favor of the plan; there were a few dissenters, however, among whom was one woman, who said she was as neat as anybody and didn't need to be told to improve her place. She said she did not think it was right to prevent people from keeping hogs in Tennesseetown.

She was finally brought to consent to try and do something toward the cleaning up and remodelling the place, and when fall came and the prizes were given out she could not understand why she took only two prizes when she had made three entries.

From this beginning, great results have been attained, but it was a work of the deepest love and the utmost patience. A thrifty, attractive settlement has taken the place of the old town of ramshackle huts. Front yards are abloom in the season, with a profusion of beautiful flowers, and vegetable gardens are most productive.

A Fascinating Book

DEAR DR. KLOPSCH:—"The Cruise of the Eight Hundred" received on Saturday, and it is proving the most fascinating book I have had for many a day. Everything, read with the Bible in my hand for reference, seems so clear, that I wish that those who doubt the "Word" could stand where these friends stood, and see what they saw.

I think you have done too much for the pleasure and profit of the subscribers of your paper. I always speak a good word for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and last year procured a new subscriber.

Wish your likeness was with the others. I would like to see the one who is doing so much to help the needy, and bring happiness to all classes.

Orange, N. J. MRS. IRA CAMPBELL.

THE PRISON-GATE MISSION

A few days ago the Superintendent of the Prison-Gate Mission visited a Rescue hall. Half the testimonies were from the lips of ex-prisoners, who declared they had been rescued from a life of sin through the Prison-Gate Mission. The first who spoke was a man named L——. He gave a testimony that was inspiring and helpful. Since his release he has decided for Christ and has been living an industrious and honest life.

Another speaker was R. A——, who spent nine years in prison. He is now a Christian man, living an honest life. His rehabilitation was brought about through the Prison-Gate Mission, which cared for him until employment came.

Among the speakers was a man from Texas. When he came to the mission he was in desperate straits. He had not prayed in forty years. Forty years in the devil's service! He is now saved and living a decent life.

The Prison-Gate Mission's work for the ex-prisoners during the past year has been as follows: Met at Prison-Gate 4,640; fed, sheltered and clothed, 1,190; found employment for 476; started to live a better life, 264.

Contributions to carry on the work of the Prison-Gate Mission may be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, or Andrew A. Knowles, Esq., treasurer, 33 Wall Street, New York City.

President Smith is said to have o attacked Smoot, telling him that his pol manipulation had done more to disgrace church than anything that had happene years.

"Smoot, according to reports, replied by ing that President Smith's testimony in the S investigation at Washington, and his open p amy, had aroused more feeling against the ch than anything else."

Japan's Ruler Presents 10,000 Yen to Aid Christian Work in the Army

FROM the Young Men's Christian Association National Union of Japan, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received, through Secretary Ober, of the Army and Navy Branch of the Y.M. C. A. in New York City, an interesting account of the circumstances attending the recent presentation by the Emperor and Empress of Japan of a substantial gift for advancing the Association's work in the army. Gen. Kodama, and several other military officials of high standing, had already become familiar with the work and knew of the excellent results it had produced. Many of the most distinguished officers in the Japanese service were unstinted in their praise. Most striking of all was the sending of a postal card to the Association by Gen. Kodama, "the brain of the army," expressing his appreciation. The following is a translation:

"EIRYO, July 19th, 1905.

I have personally seen the arrangements and equipment of your army department, and express my hearty thanks for your most gracious kindness.

(Signed) "KODAMA GENTARO,
"Chief of General Staff of the Manchurian Armies."

When peace came, the Association secretaries made careful preparations for meeting the new opportunity. As the troops were withdrawn from the north and brought to the points of embarkation, the Association tents and equipment were concentrated at these places. It was the purpose of the Association Committee to keep the entire force of secretaries on the field and to leave nothing undone to make a deep and lasting impression on the returning soldiers. With the popularity the Association already had with the experience of the secretaries in the field, and with the co-operation of the military authorities, the succeeding months became the most successful and fruitful in its history.

In the army, the religious situation was most encouraging. It is thus described by a well-informed writer in the Kyoknai Ji, a Buddhist Journal:

"Numerically speaking, Buddhism far outranks Christianity, but by reason of actual work accomplished, the balance of power is in favor of the Christians. General hatred of Christianity is passing away, and the belief that it is better adapted to the new condition of things is daily gaining ground. Buddhist customs and rites are becoming more and more alien to the interests of society, and priests are often the subject of public ridicule. The war correspondents declare the unfitness and inability of the Buddhist priests, and the more thoughtful of these priests who are at the front lament bitterly their co-workers' ignorance, senselessness and idleness, which have caused the soldiers to become tired of them. On the other hand, the quarters of the Christians are regarded as a paradise for the soldier, and they are welcome everywhere. The enormous amount of yen 200,000 has been expended by the Higanji (the largest Buddhist sect in Japan) for work among soldiers; but it is far inferior to the work of the Christian Association. The work of the Christians has attained such success that it has reached the Emperor's ear."

It was not surprising, therefore, when the Emperor at last took personal notice of the situation. One day the Secretary of the Y. M. C. A. (Japanese Union) was surprised and delighted to receive the following letter:

"To the Young Men's Christian Association Union of Japan:

"Having heard of your work for the comforting of the soldiers at the front, their Majesties, the Emperor and Empress, are pleased to grant to you the sum of ten thousand yen. (Signed)

"THE IMPERIAL HOUSEHOLD DEPARTMENT."

"Meji, Thirty-eight, Fifth Month, Sixth Day."

A Bible Class in the Japanese Army Y. M. C. A.

A photographic facsimile of the imperial communication is given on this page. Its publication has given to the work a tremendous impetus throughout the Mikado's empire. (The gift is equal to about $5,000.)

Some of the fruits of the Y. M. C. A. work in the army are thus described by Mr. G. S. Phelps, who writes from personal observation:

"I found the work flourishing at Yinkow. You would have been moved to see two fine, young soldiers baptized in the office of the Association a week ago last Sunday.

"Count Inouye and Count Matsukata, who, as you know, are the two leading elder statesmen and members of the Privy Council, have both endorsed your work, and contributed 200 yen each.

"I called upon the Japanese general commanding in China. He was greatly impressed by the gift from the Emperor. In regard to that, he said: 'You do not appreciate as I do what that means. I never expected to live to see the day when our Emperor would recognize a Christian enterprise in that way. It means that your organization, and through it Christianity, has been recognized and assisted by our Emperor. It will have far-reaching influence, and I am glad of it!' This came from a man who is not a professing Christian.

"During the same conversation, the general referred to a Christian colonel in the army who became a Christian, and was so changed that it was a marvel to all his friends."

John R. Motte, discussing the opportunity in Japan, writes:

"The first Y. M. C. A. secretaries who went to Manchuria, were eyed with suspicion, and even jeered at as Russian spies, but now every commander in Manchuria, and every soldier who has come in touch with or heard of them, looks upon them with gratitude and respect as 'the soldiers' comforters.' Never before has any Christian enterprise called forth from as high army officials such a tribute as that recently paid by the Minister of War, when he said: 'When your Association work was first launched in Manchuria I felt some anxiety concerning it, but now all apprehension has been turned into admiration.' Such words augur a new day for Christianity in Japan, for the Minister of War stands next to the Emperor.

"Perhaps the most effective speakers are the tiny copies of the Gospels in Japanese, which have been distributed with other religious literature to thousands who ask for them. A recent letter tells how Secretary Takabatake came into the inner office, leading a dozen men, all in marching order. They wanted him to pray with them as they left for the firing line. Secretary Kawasumi has just returned from one of the armies beyond Moukden, where he was overwhelmed with invitations by officers to speak to their troops, and one general had him address his officers.

"During the week following the battle of Moukden, Fujii rendered personal service to more than thirty thousand sick and wounded soldiers. He writes thus from Tashichao of his spiritual ministry: 'I am glad to tell you how I tried to talk about Christianity. I gave them the Bible and made them open to Matt. 6:25-34, and talked about the heart of our Lord. How great was their joy! I talked in this way to twenty-four men. I shall try it again to-morrow. They are saying it is true. If you have more Matthews please send me to-morrow. When I see their condition, I cannot think of leaving this place. Please let me stay a few days more.'

"There are already ten Japanese and two American secretaries at Dalny Yingkow, Fengwanchen, Liao Yang and Port Arthur, but if the urgent appeals from commanders for additional secretaries at new points were responded to, ten more would be needed now."

WHY WE SHOULD GIVE THANKS

National and World-wide Causes for Gratitude Summarized by Governors, Mayors, Judges, Bishops, College Presidents and Many Other Prominent Americans : :

WHAT has the world in general and the American people in particular to be specially grateful for at this Thanksgiving season?

This question was submitted by The Christian Herald to a number of representative Americans, including State Governors, Mayors, Bishops and Ministers of different denominations, Presidents of Colleges and Universities, Government Officials, Judges, Prominent Lawyers, and Leading Thinkers in various fields. The answers received are given herewith.

Should we not be thankful for everything that is better than it was? For peace? For "our country," with its liberty, its prosperity and its wealth, and the advanced ethical and moral standards of its people? For the fact, if for nothing else, that things are not worse? What have we as a nation to be thankful for politically, industrially, economically; in literature, in art, in science, in education? As a nation, can we not find at least one thing to be specially grateful for? What is that one thing? These were among the secondary questions that were submitted in the same connection.

The responses were so numerous that we are unable to print all the answers in their entirety—this fact alone furnishing proof that our time-honored day of Thanksgiving is this year regarded by the American people as an occasion for general rejoicing, to an extent probably attained only once in a generation.

For our peace-making President; for the treaty that stopped the killing of men and saved a hundred thousand human lives; for the awakening of the public conscience in corporate and civic matters; for the increased respect for those things that money cannot buy—the things that make for national and individual character and happiness—these are the causes for especial gratitude that are mentioned in very many of the expressions of individual views concerning what should fill our hearts and minds at this Thanksgiving season.

For the World's Prosperity and Happiness

By Gov. George A. Chamberlain, of Oregon

The world in general has reason to be thankful, because of the fact that we have a peace universal and the nations of the earth, generally speaking, are reasonably prosperous and happy. The American people in particular have occasion to rejoice in the fact that, for the first time in many years, they have a President who does not hesitate to ferret out criminals in his own official family, and to punish crime in high places wherever found, without fear or favor. That governors of a few of the States, the mayors and prosecuting officers of some of the cities of our country are beginning to look upon public office as a public trust, and are fearlessly enforcing the law and punishing the violators thereof. If such Presidents, such governors, such mayors and such prosecuting officers can be continued in office, the managers of life insurance companies and other trust concerns will soon cease to rob the widow and the orphan, and refrain from using trust funds to corrupt legislatures and debauch the voters of the country.

GEORGE A. CHAMBERLAIN.

For the Awakening of Public Conscience

By Gov. Bryant B. Brooks, of Wyoming

The world in general should be grateful for peace, for the more general settlement of international controversies by arbitration, and for closer relationship and better understanding among the nations, brought about through the medium of wireless telegraphy. The American people should be particularly grateful for the awakening and strengthening of the public conscience; for the broader education of our youth, which develops the spiritual as well as the physical and intellectual qualities; for the enforcement of law against all violators, regardless of wealth, position or power; for fruitful years, favorable seasons and unprecedented industrial activity; for great enterprises and undertakings, some completed, and others courageously carried forward, and for the substantial and gratifying progress we have made in literature, art, science, invention and education; and above all, for blessings Divine Providence has so abundantly showered upon us. BRYANT B. For the General Civic Awakening

By Gov. George C. Purdee, of California

The American people ought to be, and are, thankful, without regard to political faith or prejudices, that there is, throughout the whole United States, a civic awakening, evidenced by the fact that in all but ten of the States public officials, guilty of corrupt practices, are being punished for their offenses. Instead of this being a sign of a decadence in public morality, it is a sign of a decided improvement, for venal public officials are not a new creation, but have always been in existence. It is only lately, however, that the public has taken the matter up and determined to rid itself of the bribe-giver and the bribe-taker.

Especially thankful ought the American people to be that at the head of the nation stands President Roosevelt, who, by personal example and unwearied official effort, has done so much to arouse the sleeping public conscience. GEO. C. PURDEE.

For the General Improvement in Morals

By Mayor E. F. Dunne, of Chicago

The world in general, and the American people in particular, ought to be specially grateful upon the approaching Thanksgiving season over the fact that one of the most murderous wars of modern times has been brought to an end, and largely through the instrumentality of the President of this Republic. We are also thankful for the continued prosperity of our people, and for the manifest improvement in public morals, which is steadily sweeping over the land in all political circles.

We should also be thankful because of the fact that the revelations recently made of the corruption that has prevailed in high financial circles and in the large insurance companies of this country, will make a continuance of this corruption dangerous, if not impossible, in the future. E. F. DUNNE.

That We Are Surrounded by Christian Privileges

By Judge G. W. Atkinson (Court of Claims)

The American people, above all others, have been so blessed and favored that they should never cease to give thanks for the privileges they enjoy. Peace, prosperity, progress, educational advantages, young peoples' organizations for the betterment of their condition—all of these and a thousand others which a merciful God has vouchsafed to us, should make us thankful to Him from whom all blessings flow. The one thing I am most grateful for is the fact that I live in a Christian land, and am surrounded by Christian privileges and Christian associations.

For the Spreading of the Revival Spirit

BY DR. W. DOUGLASS MACKENZIE, PRESIDENT HARTFORD THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY

The American people will rejoice in a year of peace within and honor without. The troubles that have occurred have been incidental, and such as are likely to recur yearly in the history of such a nation fighting out its destiny on a basis never yet adopted by any people on earth. But the American people will remember for long that their President was the man who stepped forward and did what no other ruler could, in the peculiar circumstances, have accomplished. He it was who brought Russia and Japan together for their conference; and it is widely suspected that he it was who, when the negotiations threatened to break down, brought such pressure to bear as to compel the more careful reconsideration of the great alternatives of peace and war.

Special reasons for thanksgiving ought to rise in the hearts of Christian people. They will ask not merely about the national prosperity but the spread of the kingdom of God, and they will be thankful that the year has been characterized by such extraordinary movements as the revival in Wales, and Mr. Torrey's work in London; that in America there are so many signs of reawakening interest in the preaching of the Gospel and in what is especially called "reviyal work;" that abroad foreign missionaries report progress; and that especially in Manchuria, under difficulties of the most extraordinary kind, Christian missionaries have once more stood forth as men and women of undaunted courage, of pure self sacrifice, and of simple love for their fellow-men. All that redounds to the glory of the head of the church in any year ought to be made at the Thanksgiving season a matter of special meditation and joy and praise to the God of all the races.

For Freedom from War and Pestilence

BY BISHOP P. F. STEVENS

In the general prosperity, and the fact that neither war nor pestilence has caused general suffering in our country, the people should see causes for gratitude to God. For the Prevention of Unlawful Combinations

BY BISHOP SAMUEL FALLOWS

We ought to be thankful for the abundant harvests with which we have been favored; for the signal success which has crowned the efforts of our noble and greatly-loved President to bring about peace between Russia and Japan.

We ought to be thankful for the knowledge of the evils which have been attendant upon the financial management of our great life insurance organizations, and the promise of a sure and speedy remedy for them, and for the awakening of the public conscience to the unlawful and unscriptural methods which have been pursued by prominent men in the acquisition of wealth.

We ought to be thankful that the United States Government is deeply in earnest in endeavoring to prevent unlawful combinations in the restraint of trade and in violation of the rights of the common people.

Chicago especially ought to be thankful for the unmistakable intention of its chief of police to rid the city of thugs and murderers, and to drive out of business the gambling fraternity, and the low dives which have been the curse of some of its principal streets.

That Our Social Condition Is Steadily Rising

BY DR. CYRUS NORTHROP, PRESIDENT, UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

The world in general and the American people in particular, have special reason to be grateful at this thanksgiving season, that Theodore Roosevelt's commanding influence in the world has secured peace between two great warring nations, and his devotion to honesty and his determination to give every man a "square deal," make him a model of the highest manhood to which the young men of America may be pointed in confidence as a most inspiring example.

The American people in particular have special reason for rejoicing, because there is such general comfort in the land; that labor is receiving in some degree an adequate reward; that the products of the soil are abundant and are in demand; and that the general social condition is steadily rising.

The American people have special reason to be grateful because the sense of civic honor is growing and the citizens that have been submerged in dishonesty are slowly rising out of their degradation, and the people who desire decent and honest administration are asserting their power for the improvement in political and civic affairs.

The American people have great cause for thanksgiving on account of the general interest in education; the enlargement of facilities for education, the improved quality of the work done and the character of the general results.

The American people have great cause of gratitude that the men of great wealth are coming also to have a conscience, and to realize their responsibility for the wealth that they have secured, and to know that it is not their own—that they are stewards. And so they are coming to give with generous hand, immense amounts of money for the promotion of education, of religion, and of everything that is for the good of the people.

The American people have cause for gratitude that party spirit is not violent, that wherever a man appears as a champion of genuine reform and is ready to fight for the best things, the good men of all parties are ready to recognize him and to cheer him on in his good work. Under this growing sense of fairness and appreciation of the best things, the prospects for our country for the VISITING from house to house, and stopping everybody one met on the road, without finding one who professed to be a Christian, but rather who knew he wasn't—who would have thought it possible in the State of Michigan? Such was my experience.

I desired to get first-hand experience of missionary-colportage wagon work in the rural sections of our land, and was kindly favored by a colporteur of the American Baptist Publication Society, who is located in Northern Michigan, and who took me with him for two days. He is a genius in his way, and has had constructed for himself a covered wagon out of a buggy. Though not according to the latest model of the A. B. P. S. wagons, it is practical, and well suited to the needs of his field.

Leaving the town where I joined him, we struck out into the country, to a district where he had arranged for a parlor-meeting to be held that night. Going was slow, because the roads are sandy, and the horse has a heavy load to drag from day to day. Reaching the farmer's house where the meeting was to be held, we put the horse in the barn. Then, filling our pockets with tracts and testaments and papers, we went out to canvass from house to house and invite people to the evening meeting.

We stopped a German at the cross-roads, and had a good talk with him. No, he was not a Christian, but his mother had been, and she had slipped a Bible into his trunk when he left home; and his eyes filled with tears and his voice broke as he told how precious that Bible was, and how it was his custom to read it to his children.

Several men were just stopping work with a threshing machine as we went into a farmyard. As we talked to them individually, we found none were Christians. With one especially did we have an earnest word, and as his wife and little child came near—she was not a Christian either—we had prayer together, standing by the fence, urging them both to receive Christ as their Saviour, and set up the family altar in their home.

Some Sunday School picture cards gave us a chance to speak to the children about Jesus, and then the man of the place came out. Learning our business, he invited us in. There is an organ in the parlor, and we sing some hymns with the girls. There is also a guitar belonging to the farmer's absent son, which has never been tuned. My friend, the colporteur, has a guitar of his own, and so he strings and tunes this one, and soon is playing Gospel hymns. Before we leave, we read a portion of the Bible and have prayer.

The evening parlor meeting is attended by over twenty persons. All the household chairs are put in use, and more seats are provided by improvising benches out of planks supported by soap boxes. The colporteur spreads Bibles, hymn-books and other books on the centre table. We have a brief, hearty service. After some hymns, I speak on a simple Gospel theme, and as most of those present are Swedes, my friend follows with a tender appeal in Swedish on "Come unto Me." Those people have no church nearer than three or four miles—they never go to church, and enjoy no Gospel privileges except as the missionary or colporteur visits them once or twice a year.

Next day we plan to take a district which has never been canvassed by any one—real pioneer work!

What spiritual destitution! The roads are rough, the country undeveloped, the population sparse, but the spiritual need is greatest of all! Home after home where no one is a Christian, or ever thinks about his soul!

"The woman was scrubbing . . . outside the kitchen door"

We want to secure permission to hold a meeting in the schoolhouse this evening, and are directed to the chairman of the school committee. We find him repairing the fence around his home lot. He is a fine-looking, rugged farmer, of over fifty years. Yes, we can have the schoolhouse. No, he is not a Christian—he's an old hypocrite, he says. He once knew what it was, but has never been able to get it back again.

Then follows a pathetic scene. Tears ran down the old man's face as he relates his experience. He had secretly resisted God for months, until at length he surrendered, and tasted fulness of joy. But his wife—herself a Christian—thought him too fanatical, and used to criticize him, and after four years he lost it, and though he would gladly give all to regain it, he is a wicked old hypocrite, he says bitterly.

Others pictures are stamped upon my memory. Or especially that occurred during the afternoon, when we set off to canvass an outlying district, further away among the clearings, where some Swedish families live, few and far between. The woman was scrubbing clothes outside the kitchen door. Three bright children stood in the doorway, drinking in every word as my friend spoke to her about Jesus. Children in every house we visited, but no Sunday School, no one to instruct them in the Scriptures!

It was over two years since public religious services had been held in that neighborhood, and then it was a short series of evangelistic meetings in the schoolhouse.

I had now an opportunity to experience the physical hardships through which colporteurs pass. As night came on, a terrific rain and thunderstorm blew up. The attendance at our meeting was cut to about twenty, but God's Spirit was present. We had to spend the night at a Christian farmer's home three miles distant. What a drive that was! Dark as Erebus, except as the lightning flashes lit up the road; raining in torrents; wind-gusts fierce enough to bend the largest trees, and likely to blow over our wagon; threading our way over corduroy or sandy roads, one false swerve of the wagon being likely to throw us in the marsh or down the bank at the roadside. But, thanks to God, the horse and the covered wagon, we reached our destination dry and safe!

This is only a specimen of the work being done in scores of sections of America by faithful colporteurs and missionaries. Heart-to-heart talks with individuals, Scripture reading, singing and prayer in the homes; parlor and schoolhouse meetings, Gospel literature freely distributed—in every instance—how great is the need that these should be multiplied! Aren't these people worth saving? Whether home or foreign born, they are honest, hard-working people, who gave us a kindly welcome and thanked us for our interest in them, the mothers especially longing for religious privileges for their growing children.

This is a work that the Bible Institute Colportage Association could engage in, if it had enough means to equip wagons and compensate the men. $1,000 would buy a horse and wagon, and pay a man's salary for a year. Would you not like to be responsible for one?

"WHAT IF?"

"YES, I was born a Mormon. My father had four wives. But"—and here the speaker drew herself up with an air of pride, and said with assurance, "I was the daughter of the first wife."

"What if you had been the daughter of either of the others?" said I. "Would you have spoken with the same sense of superiority?"

"No," she admitted; "but of this I am certain—I am glad my mother was the first wife."

This conversation occurred in Salt Lake City, on a recent date. It has haunted the writer ever since. There are children being born to-day in Utah who, twenty years from now, will have that same question to answer. "What if you had been born of the others," and who in shame will be compelled to admit that they were born of the "others."

Polygamy has not ceased among the Mormons. The leaders of the church both practice and teach it. Be the people ever so thrifty, or possessed of all the virtues claimed for them by their admirers, still they are being misled by the powerful hierarchy of the Church, which dictates the policy of their lives.

During my visit, last week, in Salt Lake City, the head of the church, Joseph F. Smith, started on a journey with one of his wives. The newspapers commented freely on the fact that he had taken his "wife" (?) Mary with him, and questioned why it had not been his favorite "wife" (?) Edna.

Think of it, oh, my sisters—ye who hold the name of wife as the sacred crown of your womanhood—that there are men and women claiming the privileges of citizenship under the Stars and Stripes, who dare thus defy all law.

To-night, as you "cuddle doon" the precious bairns of your own household, look into their faces and ask the question: "What if?" As the hot blood surges through your being at the very thought of the shame of it, vow then and there, by the power of your love for your own, never to rest until this blot upon child-life, perpetrated in the name of religion, be forever done away.

What effort can you make?

Write to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Tell them you want to help. Send to the great League of Women's Organizations any material aid you can, that they may more freely distribute literature. Pray for the work, those who are leading in it need your prayers. There are men and women out in Utah who have laid down everything that life counts dear, in the hope that conditions may be better for the children now and in the future. Pray for them

Shall we not care because our lives are free, that theirs, forsooth, are grey-tinted with this wretched blight? Rather let us prove our sisterhood, and rise as a unit, demand for these, our own race and nation the high moral ground we claim for ourselves.

Not any one woman can accomplish this, nor any score of women. But when the womanhood of America speaks as one voice, then the nation must listen.

In this beautiful mountain town, surrounded by Nature's fastnesses, set round by the very lavishness of beauty, it does not seem possible that an evil so insidious is menacing our dear land. As I walked from church this morning, with eyes uplifted to the "hills" and spirit attuned to the "peace which passeth understanding," it was hard to believe that less than a day's journey there lay a land under a moral blight that was sapping the very fibre of its people, where men were in a death grapple with a mighty foe.

Will their vision of a better day always be a far dream? Will America forever bear this blot among her stars? Will children forever bear this stigma of shame?

Like the sound of mighty waters, the united voice of American womanhood answers, "No!"

THE GATHERING OF THE CHURCHES

The Inter-Church Conference Meets in New York--Greeted by President Roosevelt

err Boyce Tupper, D.D.

ONLY one opinion is expressed among the laity in New York, on the effort being made by the Christian ministers to get into closer union, and that opinion is a cordial approval of their course, and a heartylesire that it may be successful. From the very first m ting of the Inter-Church Conference, at Carnegie Mic Hall, on Nov. 15, there has been sincere good w manifested by the crowds which have filled the vast edice, and ready cheers for every speaker whose words h e tended to harmony and co-operation. It is evident that if the clergy can arrange to work together, th r flocks will not hold back. The people see, even m e clearly than the clergy, the wisdom of united ac on, and deplore the differences which have hitherto p vented cordial co-operation in Christian work. They h e seen what has been done in the business world, a in the political world, by leaders being willing to s t their minor differences and work together to a ieve an object that all have at heart, and they see h much might be done if the leaders in the church w ld follow the same course. The prospect of their d g so, has been hailed by the audiences in this Cference with an enthusiasm which must have convi ed the clergy that the movement is thoroughly p ular, and that it commends itself to the wisdom and c mon sense of the community.

One notable and altogether hopeful feature of the Cference was the number of aged ministers on the p tform. The preponderance of white heads there, w s most impressive. It might have been expected that th progressive step would have been altogether a y ng men's movement, and that what opposition there m ht be would come from the elderly men. But it is n so. The aged speakers have been as enthusiastic a the younger ones. They are eager to forward the p ject, and are earnest in their endeavors to disarm o position, and to greet their brethren of other com- nnions with fraternal affection.

At the first meeting of the Conference, the pastors w o participated in the proceedings belonged respectively to the Reformed Dutch Church, the Lutheran, t Methodist Episcopal, the Presbyterian, the Baptist, a l the Protestant Episcopal churches. The cordial w lcome given to each and all showed how highly they a e esteemed and how heartily the step they are taking c mmands the sympathy of the people. The object of t Conference was briefly explained by Dr. J. Cleveland Cady, who presided. Then there was read an e dorsement from the highest authority in the land, e dently recognizing the importance and value of the p ject contemplated. Mr. Roosevelt wrote:

I have the very highest sympathy with the movement; for insance, I feel that indirectly, in addition to the great good it will c here, it is perfectly possible that the movement may have a v y considerable effect in the Christianizing of Japan, which I f l to be retarded by the divisions among ourselves and by the f ilure to recognize the fact that the Christian Church in Japan m st, of course, assume essentially a Japanese national form.

So you see I have a very real interest in what you are doing, and v y wish it were in my power to attend the meeting as you request, but I regret to say that it is out of the question for me to d so.

I am genuinely sorry to have to write you thus.

A cordial welcome to the Conference from the city, w s extended by Borough President Littleton, in the u avoidable absence of Mayor McClellan. He drew a p rallel between the office-holder and the clergyman, o the fact that both are servants of the public, and expressed the wish that the former were always as faithful a d as patriotic as the latter. It rested, he believed, w th the clergy, to raise the moral tone of the public, a d he was not exaggerating the value of their work, w hen he said that there was no force existing in this R epublic which could be more safely trusted to eradi- c te the low and corrupting conditions of society, than t e men who, Sunday after Sunday, preach the elevating t uths of Christianity. He wished that it was not so c mmon for men doing so useful a work, to have to regard their remuneration as "the substance of things h ped for, the evidence of things not seen."

An eloquent speech by Dr. Charles L. Thompson, S ecretary of the Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church, gave the keynote to the ensuing sessions of the Conference. He described the early attitude of the churches as one almost of mutual hostility. Then there had come an era of the "Let alone policy," which was a shade better than hostility, but was a long way from brotherhood. Then came an era of comity. This was brotherhood, but, like the relations of Abram and Lot, it was a division of the land, so that one would not interfere with the other. This had been followed by co-operation in good work. The next step was one that it was hoped this Conference would take —that of federation, the united action in which every denomination would have a part in evangelizing the world and influencing society. That would bring about a solidarity that would powerfully affect the world. That was Christ's desire, that his followers might be one, that the world might believe. Denominationalism had failed to check the tide of scepticism and of indifference. The evidence of the fact could be seen in every daily paper. The world needed faith to lift it above its woes and sorrows, and sins and that faith would come when it saw the churches acting and working together, one in faith and purpose. No church would be asked to give up its denominational flag, but as in that great battle of the war in the charge up the mountain, the flags of the States were so mixed, that none could tell in the distance which were the regiments from Ohio or Massachusetts, yet the whole army was one in its fidelity and purpose; so the churches, as they climbed to the higher ground, would be in union so close that only the omniscient eye could distinguish them, yet they would be a unit in fighting the battle of the Lord. Then at last would Christ's prayer for unity be answered and he would see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied.

W. H. Roberts, D.D., LL.D.

A significant feature of the Conference was the fact that most of the speakers were eager to point out spheres in which a federation of the churches might act with advantage. Already, before federation is organized, its work is laid out and an extensive programme is outlined. The natural inference is that if so much work is waiting to be done, and if, as is the general opinion, federation be the agent to accomplish it, there should be no time lost in bringing that federation to pass.

A prominent instance in point was Bishop Doane's earnest appeal for a reform of our marriage customs, He pleaded for more care on the part of clergymen, who are now in many cases ready to marry any couple who present themselves, no matter how young or how careless they may be. He pleaded with the clergy to impress on their people the sanctity of the relation, and by their own care in performing the ceremony to impart a consciousness of its high moral obligations. A federation of the churches, bringing the clergy up to this standard, would, he believed, be useful in checking the growing frequency of divorce in the United States.

J. B. Devins, D.D.

The great and threatening problem of poverty was another topic which was pressed on the attention of the Conference by Dr. Henry Van Dyke. He rightly contended that the churches could not afford to ignore this terrible problem, which is too great for any one denomination to solve. United action by the whole Christian community, he insisted, was needed to keep the country from drifting into indifference to the misery endured by the class which, by social conditions, is condemned to hopeless poverty. The churches, speaking with united voice through their federation, could protest against the cruel, heartless competition which made the poor poorer every day. A broader sympathy with the wage-earner, an insistence on his right to a living wage, and a protest against the accumulation of vast fortunes at the expense of the toiling millions, were needed, and they could come only through the teaching of Christianity continually given by a united church.

The decision of the Committee to exclude Unitarians from the movement elicited a stinging rebuke from Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, president of the great Baptist University. "I would not like," he said, "to be a candidate for any heaven from which James Martineau and William Ellery Channing were excluded." Another eloquent speaker summarized the spirit of the Conference when he said: "We hope to have the Christian bodies standing shoulder to shoulder in all great movements for righteousness, such as marriage and divorce, social evils, child labor, and the relation of labor to capital." The success of federation in New York had been proved, said Dr. Laidlaw, the secretary of the movement in that city, and he enumerated some of the practical results, citing the establishment of a people's park, summer playgrounds for children, two Settlements applying the Gospel, a co-operative parish system for neighborhood visitation, and church attention given to crippled children.

The practical, definite outcome of the Conference is not known at the period of writing. It may take months to properly elaborate in a working form. The general idea is so good that it would be a pity for it to be spoiled by hasty organization. The English system may serve as a model, but must necessarily be modified to allow for differences in the extent of territory to be covered. One important feature, however, will probably be retained. It is, that representatives on the central body shall be representatives of territory, not of denominations. It has been found in England that this provision has been conducive to harmony and success. The local unions, of course, elect their own officers, and it has been learned by experience that it is better for them to elect the national representatives than that the denominations should elect them. By this means rivalry is avoided, and the central committee becomes representative of the churches at large, hailing from sections, and being the most suitable men in those sections, regardless of denominational affiliations.

The results of federation in England are such as would be welcomed here. The Federation Council has arranged missions which have resulted in large additions to the churches; it has organized crusades for checking the liquor traffic; for preventing the desecration of the Lord's Day; for the suppression of gambling, and for promoting social purity. Recently it has taken up the work of providing homes for working girls, through an organization of Girls' Guilds, which has done a magnificent work in protecting the girls from temptation and caring for them at the critical period of life. Thus, in the social world, as well as in the political world, federation has found useful occupation, while attending to its primary object of promoting spirituality and extending the evangelization of the country.

The Union of the Churches

WHAT a gathering! What a host!
From the boundary to the coast.
Messages by every post,
Union in the air.
Side by side they bow the knee
Holy Father, unto thee.
Love is pulsing full and free
In each heartfelt prayer.

Highest work have they to do.
Ever by God's faithful few,
Saint and prophet, tried and true,
Are his victories won.
Mightiest foes have they to fight,
O thou, Guardian of the right.
Give them wisdom, give them might—
Let thy will be done.

Heart to heart they're drawing nearer,
Eye to eye they're seeing clearer,
Ties of brotherhood grow dearer,
As they onward go.
Strong in union let them stand.
Heart to heart and hand to hand,
"Solid front" throughout the land,
Turned toward the foe.

Thanksgiving

WHAT an overwhelming array of reasons for thankfulness, as a nation, as communities and as individuals, is presented in the Symposium which appears in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to-day. These communications are the spontaneous expressions of nearly half a hundred of the warmest hearts and soundest heads in the country, and they are to be accepted as in the highest sense representative of the real feelings of the whole American people at this Thanksgiving season. Every letter is a sermon in epitome—short, fervent, epigrammatic, and essentially suited to the time and spirit of the occasion.

There is a very notable unanimity among the distinguished contributors, in placing foremost as a cause for national thankfulness the great awakening of the civic conscience, which is cleansing our cities as though by fire. The people, no less than those in authority, are rising to the appreciation of a higher and nobler standard of public service. There is a strong and irresistible movement in favor of a more rigid accountability and more honest methods in all enterprises in which the people have a direct interest. Corporate power is no longer uncontrolled. Every day is making clearer to the possessors of wealth their duties and responsibilities, and the fact that riches are less a personal possession than a trusteeship. Great wealth acquired through doubtful means, is now seen to bring dishonor to its possessor.

On social and industrial lines, too, the improvement is so marked as to be a cause of general thankfulness. There is now more consideration for the worker than ever before, and his relations with the employer are steadily improving.

Our national government has contributed to the general feeling of gratification by its administrative reforms and the wholesome check it has applied to corporate lawlessness. These, honestly followed out, cannot fail to be effective in bringing about a higher standard of morality in public affairs. Great blessing has resulted from our intervention in behalf of the peace of the world, and the remembrance of this fact constitutes one of the chief joys of Thanksgiving time.

Last, but not least, the great Family of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers throughout the globe, have special cause for thanksgiving. The glorious Gospel is advancing in all lands, and Christ is now preached to every nation under the sun. Civilization and humanity are extending on every hand. With peace and plenty at home, with countless blessings around us, such as our forefathers never knew, and with unshaken faith that He who hears our prayers and prospers every good work will continue his loving care of all His children, we would be ungrateful indeed if we did not feel that we had unusual cause for gratitude.

Let us not fail, at this joyous season, to remember the poor within our gates. If we make their portion a liberal one by our gifts, we may cheer their hearts and comfort their lonely lot, and in doing so we shall make doubly sweet our own enjoyment of the Thanksgiving festival.

The Jewish Persecution

OVER in Russia, bedlam is let loose. No Thanksgiving there. The Gog and Magog of Ezekiel seem to have spread their baleful wings above the ill-fated empire. After ages of oppression and cruelty, a down-trodden and oppressed people, steeped to the lips in superstition with ignorance, are not ready for freedom. They turn and rend the Hebrews, who arouse their envy by being better educated, better mannered, more thrifty, and more intelligent than their neighbors. During the centuries, history repeats itself. Always there is the same shameful brutality shown to the Jew. It is an ineffaceable blot upon Christendom that this should be.

Over here in New York, a meeting was held the other day which presents in startling contrast the difference between the enlightenment of a true Christian civilization, and the darkness of a half-dead religion. Jew and Gentile met together in a Baptist sanctuary. Clergymen of varying creeds and Jewish rabbis in turn addressed the people. A Scotchman, whose liberality is as great as his common sense, headed the list of benefactions with ten thousand dollars. Jew and Christian united in making liberal contributions to aid the starving and persecuted Hebrews, trampled under the heel of hate and wrath in Russia.

It is a pre-millennial sign. We need not yet despair. Somehow out of all the tangles, there is coming the smoothness and the straightness of a better day. Somehow, after the drenching of human blood, there shall spring up and flower the white blossoms of a deathless liberty and a shining peace. Though there be tumult and clamor, greed and rapacity, fury and anger, there is coming before very long the blessedness of a new civilization, and "God's in his heaven, all's right with the world."

The Woman's Memorial

THE time for the presentation of the Women's Memorial to the United States Senate is near at hand. To every reader who desires to aid the success of this great national movement for the purification of Congress from the influence of the polygamous Mormon hierarchy, and for the protection of the American home, we would say: "Write to the United States Senators from your State at once, if you have not already done so; urge them to support the Memorial and to give voice and vote in its behalf at the earliest opportunity. The women of our land have begun this movement with the double purpose of ridding the Senate of a Mormon Apostle who is unworthy to make laws for the American people, and of securing the passage of a Constitutional Amendment absolutely prohibiting polygamy in every State of the Union.

When the Committee on Privileges and Elections submits its report of the Smoot investigation, the whole question will then come up before the Senate. That report cannot be smothered in Committee. The united voices of the mothers and daughters of the country demand that it shall not be juggled, but publicly and fairly presented, and that the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee be rendered clearly and unequivocally. But before that report comes, it is important that every Senator from every State should know how his constituents stand upon this great national question.

Write the letters, then, to your Senators without delay, and let them be brief and to the point. A united front and prompt action now, may go very far toward deciding the battle.

The Martyrs in China

"The Noble Army of Martyrs Praise Thee, O God!"

IN the chorus of that triumphant praise there mingle new voices, voices of those who have witnessed for Christ to the death, in China, within a few days. The brief story of the murder of Dr. Eleanor Chestnut, Mr. and Mrs. John Rodgers Peale, Mrs. Machle and her daughter Amy, at Lien Chow, has saddened many hearts in this land. Mr. and Mrs. Peale were new missionaries, who left this country for their field only last August. Dr. Chestnut has been doing the beneficent work of a medical missionary for some years. The outbreak was unexpected, and the missionaries were greatly beloved by the people around them. In the last year, Dr. Chestnut treated more than five thousand patients. Dr. Machle, whose wife and daughter were killed, during the same time in the men's hospital treated more than seven thousand patients. These devoted missionaries belonged to the Presbyterian Board, and the loss suffered by that great Church is a loss which awakes the deepest sympathy in every evangelical communion.

At the first glance, it would seem as if so costly a sacrifice were not needed, but there is no waste in God's economy. These precious lives, laid down at the hands of a cruel and senseless mob, utterly ungrateful, utterly reckless, will not have been offered up in vain. How terrible must be the darkness! How extreme the need of a people who can requite kindness in such a way as this! More missionaries will go to take the place of those who have fallen. At the door of selfish and indefensible exclusion policy on the part of the American Government, perhaps lies the blame for these last deaths of those who have lived and died in the far-off land.

Our New Serial

IN next week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will appear the opening chapters of a new and brilliant serial, "The Chariots of the Lord," by Joseph Hocking, the well-known English author. Mr. Hocking's works have already attained a wide popularity on both sides of the Atlantic, although the coming story will be the first from his pen to appear in these pages.

In "The Chariots of the Lord," the author deals with that extremely picturesque period of English history—the seventeenth century. It was an age of religious intolerance, of prelatical persecution, when to be a dissenter from the church favored by the crown meant a quick path to the pillory, a cart-tail whipping, or even the gallows itself.

Introducing in his story many of the leading characters of that stirring time (among them the notorious Lord Jeffreys and the sainted Richard Baxter), Mr. Hocking has woven a tale of such wonderful interest, so full of pathos and of romance, yet so true to history and the records of those days, that no reader will fail to be attracted and delighted. Further, it is a story full of that quality of spiritual helpfulness which is characteristic of all of this author's literary work. We believe it will be universally read, and wherever read, it will assuredly be appreciated.

Among the Workers

—THE FRENCH Y. W. C. A., of New York City, has opened its new headquarters at No. 34 West Eighteenth Street, New York. This is the beginning of what seems likely to prove a good work. O. Buensod is president, and R. Delay secretary.

—THE UNION GOSPEL MISSION of New Orleans has conducted meetings during the prevalence of the yellow fever in that city, and its workers have been active in their spiritual duties even in the face of the dread scourge. It is situated at No. 1811 Magnolia Street, E. A. Vail, Superintendent.

—REV. WILBUR F. CHAPMAN'S recent address, at the Commercial Club of Minneapolis, during the revival, has been much discussed by the thoughtful business men of that city. It dealt with the widespread disregard in business circles for the old-time principles of integrity, honor and Christian manhood. Dr. Chapman, in his work there, represented a committee of more than three Minneapolis business men, who control millions of capital and employ thousands of men, women, boys and girls.

—FROM JAMAICA, W. I., comes the news of an astonishing revival wave which has swept over many towns and villages on the West Indian Island. Kingston, Hannah Town, St. Andrew's, St. Mary's, Spanish Town, and many other localities, report hundreds of conversions. Revs. S. R. Braithwaite, E. A. Bell, J. K. Isham, E. B. Hopkins, Rev. Dr. Prowd, Rev. Mr. Mellop, Rev. T. Gordon, and Rev. G. Somers are among the workers. The revival began at a C. E. meeting in St. John's Church, Hannah Town. Many children are among the converts.

Delighted with the "Cruise"

I acknowledge with many thanks the receipt of "The Cruise of the Eight Hundred." I am delighted with it, and expect to have many pleasant hours from its perusal, and enjoy the pleasure of the voyage, without the fatigue, through its wonderful pages.

Philipsburg, East Canada. MISS H. N. CHEESMAN.

Myself and family are delighted with the "Cruise of the Eight Hundred." It gives very graphically a continuous picture of the notable trip which we wanted to take, but could not, to the World's Sunday School Convention at Jerusalem. The illustrations are fine, a panorama of just the scenes that every Bible-lover loves to look upon as they are to-day.

We get value received in reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, but wish to thank you for the premium book. It is worth many times its cost. MRS. M. M. ANDREW.

The BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

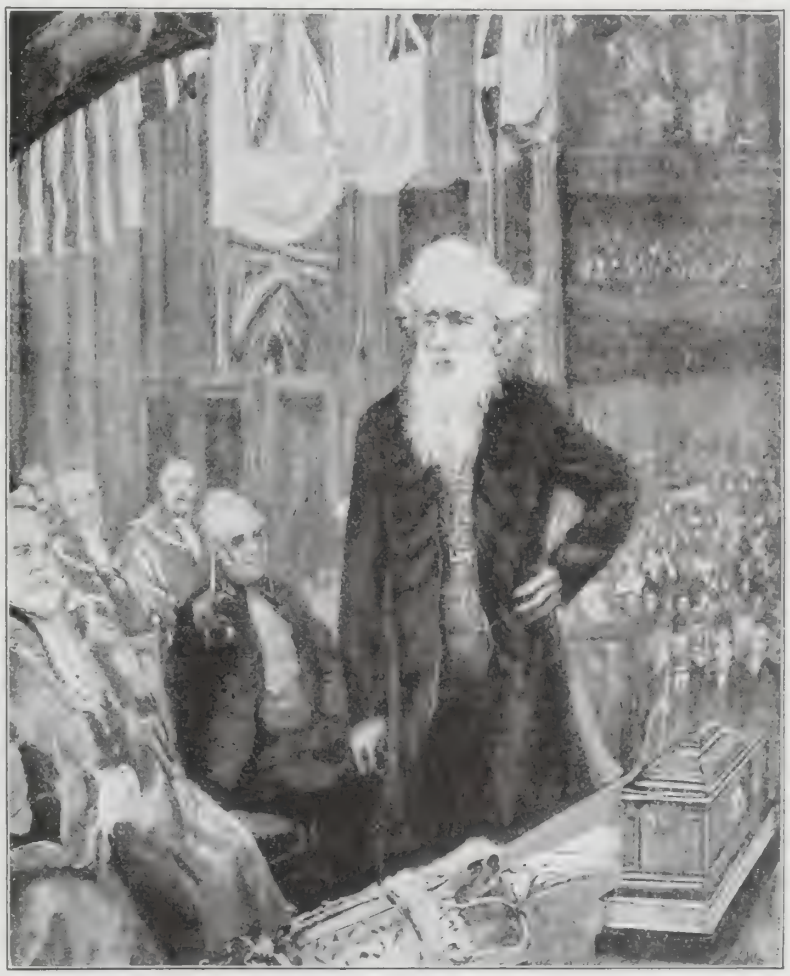
Gen. Booth Honored

ALMOST unprecedented in the annals of the City of London was the honor recently conferred on General Booth, the head of the Salvation Army. Princes, distinguished statesmen, victorious generals have been recognized by the great Corporation, but it is something unique for the chief of a distinctly religious organization to be made a freeman of the City of London. None of the quaint ceremonies were omitted from the ancient observance. The General having received notice of the honor to be done him, went to the Guildhall, escorted by a thousand of his officers. He was accompanied by his son Bramwell Booth, by his son-in-law Booth Tucker, and by seven other Commissioners. On his arrival he made the customary oath that he would be "good and true," would keep the King's peace," would be obedient to the Lord Mayor of the City" and would not "join in any gathering or conspiracy against the peace of the King." He was then escorted to the dais and took his seat beside the Lord Mayor. The City Chamberlain then made the formal presentation of the precious document, with the resolution of the Court ordering the gift. These were enclosed in a richly carved oak casket. As is usual in such cases to have the casket of gold, but at Gen. Booth's own request, a wooden one was used, and the difference in the value, amounting to $500, was given to the funds of the Salvation Army. The City Chamberlain outlined the services rendered to the people of the city, which were thus officially recognized, and expressed the desire of the Corporation that such services should be suitably noticed. For the man who had initiated a work so beneficent, he said: "There could be no adequate earthly reward. Of him it might be said, 'The poor thy clients and heaven's smile thy fee.' But this imperial city, through its Corporation, was pleased to recognize publicly its indebtedness and mark its gratitude by placing the name of William Booth on the register of her honorary citizens—a register which already bore the names of Britain's best and most valued sons." Concluding, he said: "The citizens of London are proud, General Booth, to offer you, through me, the right hand of fellowship and to receive into their body one whose aim has been the rescue of the hopeless and the elevation of human nature. On behalf of the Lord Mayor, the Court of Aldermen and the Court of Common Council, I beg to ask your acceptance of this casket containing the copy of your freedom." In accepting the honor, Gen. Booth referred to the colloquy cast on the Salvation Army in its early days and described the objects it had sought to accomplish. The honor done him that day was an evidence of the measure of success it had attained. Much still remained to be done, and though now in his seventy-seventh year, he hoped yet to live to see a still larger work achieved than in the past. In the evening, the event was celebrated by the giving of a dinner to 5,000 homeless persons, at the Shelters which the Army has established in the poor districts of the city.

"Blessed is he that considereth the poor: the Lord will preserve him and keep him alive, and he shall be blessed upon the earth." (Ps. 41: 1, 2.)

Russian Disorders

Social and business and political disturbances increase in Russia. A prominent editor being asked why the liberal promises of the Czar and Count Witte did not produce tranquillity, seeing that they were larger than even the Extremists had originally demanded, replied that "the government was distrusted, and that no one could tell how soon the Czar might discharge Count Witte and re-establish the autocracy and the still more dreaded bureaucracy. The government was in the position of a bankrupt trader, with whom business could be done only on a basis of cash down." An act which increases this distrust is the proclamation of martial law in Poland. Encouraged by the concessions granted to the Finns, the Poles petitioned for similar autonomy. The Czar's answer was to put all the ten provinces of Poland under rigorous military rule. This fact becoming known, caused general exasperation throughout the empire and a profound conviction that the Czar was not sincere in the promises he was making to European Russia, shall be granted to the peasants on easy terms. It is stated that the land will be divided into fifteen-acre farms, and will be surrendered to landless peasants for payments covering thirty-five years. A concession so enormous would, a year ago, have filled the hearts of the peasants with joy and gratitude, but now it may not satisfy them. Like the political concessions, it may have been made too late. When a government yields through fear what it would not yield from any other motive, its days are numbered. No one can predict with any confidence what the future will be, but there is reason to fear that, whether the insurrection succeeds or is suppressed, there will be an appalling sacrifice of life.



Gen. Booth Acknowledging the Municipal Honor, in the Guildhall, London

Russia. A general strike was immediately ordered by the labor unions as a protest against the coercion in Poland. Every train in and out of St. Petersburg ceased running, the factories were closed and no newspapers could be issued. Count Witte issued an appeal to the strikers, addressed to "Brother Workmen," begging them to return to work. No notice, however, was taken of his request. How long the strike will last cannot be predicted, but it will probably not be long, as the unions are greatly impoverished.

An ominous feature of present conditions is that the peasants are rising. Their numbers are so largely in excess of the workingmen, and they are so much more ignorant, that an outbreak among them, if it became general, would be immensely more dangerous. It is reported from districts of the interior that they are pillaging the property of their landlords and are setting fire to their mansions. Probably with a view of checking the rising at the outset, the Czar issued a manifesto, promising that a large part of the Imperial lands, which constitute nearly a third of "The Lord hath broken the staff of the wicked and the sceptre of the rulers; he who smote the people in wrath is persecuted and none hindereth." (Isa. 14: 5, 6.)

Co-operation in Immigration

A special agent from the Immigration Bureau in Washington, D. C., has been sent to London, to confer with the British authorities on the subject of undesirable immigrants. The British Parliament at its last session passed a law excluding criminals and immigrants of a certain type. Our agent is commissioned to make arrangements with the British authorities for information to be sent here of all such persons whom they have excluded, so that, if failing to effect a settlement in England, they come to this country, our own inspectors may be on the alert to detect them. The agent is also instructed to examine and report on the padrone system of Italy, and on the various measures adopted in European lands to get rid of undesirable citizens by assisting them to emigrate. In this way, it is hoped that both countries may cease to be made a refuge for the refuse of Europe. Thus it will become increasingly difficult for the wrongdoer, however repentant he may be, to make a new start in another land. What a blessing it is that Christ makes no such restrictions in his kingdom, but authorizes his servants to promise admission to every penitent soul.

Him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out (John 6: 37).

Coffined in Steel

A strange burial service took place a few days ago, near the Mudvale Steel Works, in Pennsylvania. It was of the bodies of two employees in the works, who lost their lives in an accident there. They were working in a crucible pit, when a mass of molten steel, weighing eighty tons, was suddenly released and poured upon them. They must have been converted into ashes and gas in the fraction of a second. Not a vestige of their bodies or of their garments survived that intense heat. The company sympathized with the families of the men in their sorrow, that even the sad satisfaction of burying their bodies was denied them, and were, besides, shocked at the idea of metal permeated with human bodies being used for any purpose. It was therefore decided to cut away the lower portion of the mass, which must have been the part that consumed them. This was reverently interred with appropriate exercises in the vicinity of the works. It must have seemed very strange to the mourners to hear the prayers being offered over that mass of steel. Yet the condition of the body, whether turned to dust in the grave or decaying at the bottom of the sea, or as in this case, combined with inert material, cannot affect the safety of the soul if in life it has been committed to Christ.

I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day (II. Tim. 1: 12).

A Wedding-Dress Dedicated

An interesting meeting of veterans of the Civil War is shortly to be held in Colorado, to celebrate the transfer of a flag. A romantic interest attaches to the relic. It appears that a young man of Missouri, who had been married only a few months when the war broke out, volunteered, and became captain of a company in the Confederate service. In his first letter home he told his wife that the company had no flag. The government was spending everything for the necessaries of life, and there was little prospect of getting a flag. The wife, however, was equal to the occasion. She took down the white silk dress in which she had been married, and cut it in strips. Another dress supplied the needed red, and from one or two hats she cut the blue. Thus furnished, the flag was made and forwarded to the young soldier at the front. The flag was carried in many battles, was riddled with bullets, and worn to tatters; eventually in a battle it was captured by the captain of a Colorado company. It is only recently that he learned the story of the construction of the flag. He made inquiries, and found that the woman who made it was dead, but her husband is still living. He proposes to restore it to him, believing that a relic endeared by the tenderest of a wife's sacrifice must be precious to him. All the surviving veterans of both regiments have been invited to meet and witness the restoration of the battle-scarred relic. That woman must have had an intense love for the cause to enable her to overcome the sentimental value she naturally placed on her wedding dress. Where there is true devotion, sacrifices become a delight.

Rev. Mr. Ruliffson, the Founder

THE BOWERY MISSION ANNIVERSARY

IT HAS STOOD FOR TWENTY-SIX YEARS A BEACON LIGHT TO WANDERERS IN SIN

J. G. Hallimond, Superintendent

THE Twenty-Sixth Anniversary of the opening of the Bowery Mission was held on Sunday, November 12th. The Anniversary Sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Ross Stevenson, D.D., in the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, and was listened to by a large and sympathetic congregation. It was peculiarly appropriate and forcible.

A very large crowd assembled at the evening meeting in the Mission. Here the two principal addresses were delivered by the Rev. John Bancroft Devins, D.D., the editor of The Observer, and the Rev. Wm. C. Stinson, D.D., pastor of the Boulevard Reformed Church. Dr. Devins spoke in the heartiest terms of commendation of the three CHRISTIAN HERALD benovolences, viz.: The Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, the Indian Orphanages, and the Bowery Mission. He declared, that, from his personal observation, he believed that the Christian Church had never witnessed more beautiful work than had been done by these institutions; that he had seen himself, hundreds of children in India whose lives had been undoubtedly saved by the efforts of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers. There was no name more loved and honored, either in America or in India, he said, than that of Dr. Louis Klopsch. Very skilfully, Dr. Devins brought his address around from these manifestations of the Christ-Spirit to the practical question, which he drove home with great force: "What think ye of Christ?"

Dr. Stinson is one of the most popular and powerful of New York City pastors, and a frequent visitor to the Bowery Mission. He declared that all over this country, even in far-away California, he had come across Christian men who were brought to Christ in the Bowery Mission.

Dr. DeWitt Nelson, a city physician, read the Scriptures; Mr. George Simmons of Brooklyn, Mr. Joseph Fisher of Newark, a converted saloon-keeper, and others, sang and spoke, and many thrilling testimonies of redeemed men were given.

The Bowery Mission was never busier than at the present time. Dr. O'Hanlon's Question and Answer Bible Class is being welcomed with great enthusiasm. Preparations are being made for the Thanksgiving and Christmas services, and for the Early Morning Breakfasts, which commence on Thanksgiving morning. Almost every evening during the winter months the Mission platform is occupied by some prominent city minister. Amongst the names of those who have undertaken to preach are: Bishop Coadjutor Greer, Rev. R. L. Paddock, D.D., Rev. W. Knight McGown, D.D., Rev. Karl Reiland, Rev. A. Duane Pell, D.D., Rev. H. Mottet, D.D., Rev. R. R. Claiborne, D.D, Rev. L. C. Rich, D.D., Rev. W. Everett Johnson, D.D., Rev. A. J. Derbyshire, D.D., Rev. J. P. Peters, D.D., Rev. J. T. Patey, D.D., all of the Protestant Episcopal Church. Amongst the Methodist Episcopal ministers are Rev. Wallace McMullen, D.D., Rev. George E. Strobridge, D.D., Rev. William A. Stonehill, Rev. C. W. McPherson, Rev. Robert Bagnell, Rev. R. E. Bell, D.D., Rev. J. R. Henry, D.D., Rev. T. S. Bond, D.D., Rev. C. L. Goodell, D.D. From the Presbyterian Church, Rev. George Alexander, D.D., Rev. A. P. Atterbury, D.D., Rev. J. B. Devins, D.D., Rev. A. H. Evans, D.D., Rev. J. Lewis Clark, D.D. From the Baptist Church, Rev. E. Holloway, D.D., Rev. A. B. McLaurin, D.D., Rev. P. McGregor, D.D., Rev. E. J. Holden, Rev. K Boyce Tupper, D.D., Rev. C. J. Keevil, D.D., Rev. B. Bosworth, D.D., Rev. R. J. Davies, D.D. From Congregational Church, Rev. H. A. Stimson, D. Rev. C. E. Jefferson, D.D., Rev. F. Lynch, D. Rev. R. G. Davey and Rev. S. H. Cox.

The work of soul-saving never shows any sign abatement. Some of the most wonderful rescues Mission has ever known have been made during rec weeks. On the Sunday evening of the anniversary letter was handed in to the Superintendent from who was for several years a medical man in Penns vania and who was recently reclaimed. The follow is an extract from it:

"Two weeks ago to-day I did not expect to see other sun rise. I was desperate, discouraged, and l come to a point where I could not reason. I had f gotten God's promises, and although I went throu the form of prayer daily, I failed to realize that could help me. His loving mercy, however, led me the Mission House and yourself, and my urgent te poral needs were attended to by you. I cannot fi words to express my gratitude for all you have done me. This home in the Memorial House is heaven af the miseries I have gone through, and I feel returni strength every day. My mother's address is——. you can spare the time, a few words from you telli her of my rescue will be greatly appreciated. I a not exaggerating when I say that your interest sav me from a suicide's grave. God bless you."

Thanksgiving Time Then and Now

SEE ILLUSTRATION ON FIRST PAGE

THANKSGIVING, starting as a New England festival, has spread over the newer States of the Union; across the waves of the Pacific to the Phillipines, and to every spot of earth where an American has his permanent or temporary abode. If it be but one lone citizen of the Republic, pacing the streets of a foreign city, strange tongues babbling in his ears, strange signs upon the streets; his mind turns on Thanksgiving morning to home and country, to turkey and mince pie.

The Puritans instituted the custom of a harvest feast, in thankfulness for peace, a bountiful crop; blessings that came not too often in those days of famine and of savage onslaught. The date of observance has varied, gradually being pushed back to the last of November, when the supplies were in and the long winter was hovering like a besieging army of snow and ice at the very doors. The religious element was never forgotten in the old days of beaver hat and poke bonnet. The preparations for Thanksgiving were begun, not a day, or two days, before the feast, but a full week before Thanksgiving, and, on the morning designated in the stately proclamation of the governor, the entire family went early, to give thanks for the blessings of the year.

A picturesque sight it was, this morning parade to church, in the early thirties, the time chosen by our artist for the cover picture. The men had not adopted the sombre costume of today. Coat and waistcoat were of many colors, sometimes of plaids of such varied hue as to rival Joseph's over-garment of famous memory. The costume of the women, with its ruffles, hoop skirt, voluminous shawls, silk-lined and plumed bonnet, makes one dou if our grandmothers had as their chi desire the simplicity so often harp upon by people of the stamp of "l us go back."

The new Thanksgiving is on broader and more Christian bas Before we gather around the fami board we look out for the sick a poverty-stricken family living in alley some blocks away. Right a left people are working so that that morning rich and poor may sa "We thank Thee."

LET US GIVE THANKS

FOR all that God in mercy sends:
For health and children, home a friends,
For comfort in the time of need,
For every kindly word and deed,
For happy thoughts and holy talk,
For guidance in our daily walk—
For everything give thanks!

For beauty in this world of ours,
For verdant grass and lovely flowers,
For song of birds, for hum of bees,
For the refreshing summer breeze,
For hill and plain, for streams a wood,
For the great ocean's mighty flood—
In everything give thanks!

For the sweet sleep which comes wit night,
For the returning morning's light,
For the bright sun that shines on high,
For the stars glittering in the sky;
For these and everything we see,
O Lord! our hearts we lift to Thee.
For everything give thanks!

DR. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS

In his Preface to this Charming Volume, Dr. Banks says:

"BIOGRAPHY, where the real personality is revealed, is ever the most entertaining and instructive of all literature. This is a book of biography at magnetic points. It is full of the warm, red blood of very live men and women.

"It has been the purpose of the author to gather in this volume such stories of love, heroism, and adventurous daring, together with lighter incident, as would make the personalities of the people discussed, alive and real to the reader. More than half of those whose names are disclosed in this table of contents are yet living among us, and the rest still live in these stories of a vital personal career which make them immortal.

"The author has not attempted, in compiling this volume, to make it exhaustive. Another volume might be made like it, with different names, and another, and another, so rich is American history and American life in strong and vigorous and heroic personality. But he has sought to give the reader a rich mine of striking, virile stories of picturesque interest and variety, into which it would always be a pleasure to delve, either for entertainment, or to find golden nuggets for use.

"Whatever may be the judgment of the readers as to the wisdom of the selections, in the midst of such embarrassment of resources, the author feels that the book will at least have one great merit—it will be interesting, and no one will be able to spend an hour with it without his wits being brightened, and his heart stirred by communion with genuine and attractive people."

A Magnificent Volume of Life, Love and Adventure

THIS Absorbingly Interesting Book is a Veritable Treasure House of Short Stories, Brimful of Intense Human Interest and Healthful Sentiment. THE STRIKE AT ROCK CITY

A THANKSGIVING STORY

BY SUSAN M. GRIFFITH

THE strike had been on for two months at Rock City, and things were growing desperate. Cold weather was approaching rapidly, for November was more than half gone; already snowstorms threatened, and old residents predicted a long and severe winter.

The miners were not prepared to endure it. They had laid by little or nothing for this "evil day," and as the days dragged on, and the superintendent remained obdurate, turning a deaf ear and a contemptuous look to all their demands, they hourly became more surly and sullen and threatening.

They had expected much from this strike. They had boasted often and loudly, that they would speedily bring the sneering superintendent to their own terms, and make him eat his fill of "humble pie," but their triumph was short-lived, almost strangled in its birth, in fact, for "On the side of their oppressor there was power," and all their efforts for an increase of wages and better homes, were ending in wretched failure. It really looked as if both the superintendent and the owner of the mines would rather they would remain inoperative for an indefinite time, than to give way a single inch, or agree to a reasonable compromise. And meanwhile, the long, cold winter was coming on, and before them stretched months of suffering and privation, sure to end in sickness and possible starvation. Many of them already regretted the step that had thrown them out of employment, and would gladly have returned to work at the same old price, had they been allowed to do so; but their leader angrily frowned down the first suggestion.

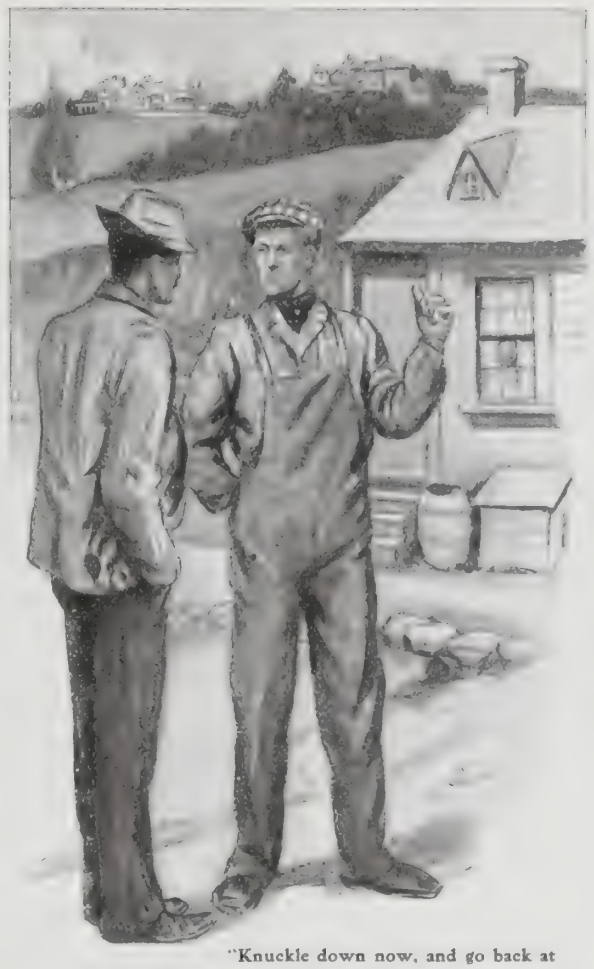
"Knuckle down now, and go back to work at the same old wage," said he, "and we'll never get an increase, never, and our houses'll rot over our heads afore they'll fix em. No, sir! Stick it out to the bitter end, and if the 'supe' don't come to terms, we'll find a way to make him." And the speaker ground his teeth in impotent fury, shook his fist, and gave a fierce, vindictive glance at the object of his remarks speeding past in his splendid automobile.

Upon a handsome rise of ground overlooking the long, irregular rows of dilapidated cottages occupied by the miners, was the beautiful residence of Franklin Abbott, owner of the Rock City mines. Just opposite, was the only less handsome house of Hall Clayson, the young and dashing superintendent; and, dotting the widespread landscape, were pretty dwellings by the score, belonging to people of thrift; for, although Rock City was unquestionably a mining town, it was so "beautiful for situation," and the surrounding country afforded so many facilities for enjoyment, that a wealthy and favored class of individuals had gathered there, intent upon making the most of the beauties of nature. The little place had, consequently, built up from a mere hamlet to a considerable town, numbering possibly five thousand inhabitants, and it had its college, its conservatory of music, its public library, its seven churches, its paved streets and electric lights, even its pretty park, with all the up-to-date means for holiday entertainments. Only one blot rested upon this picturesque little town, and this was the low row of ugly habitations in which the miners lived, a constant reproach to those in the full enjoyment of a prosperous life. Little wonder that a dark spirit of envy and bitter jealousy sprang up in the breasts of these underground workmen, making an ominous cloud of ill-smothered wrath rest upon their faces, as they hung about the corners of the streets in large and numerous groups, nursing their bad feelings and talking over their real and fancied injuries. Every day the cloud grew blacker and denser, and every day they looked more fiercely and threateningly at the two great handsome houses on the hill, wearing in the restless depths of their blind, unreasoning hearts, that they would not wait for God's vengeance, but would take matters into their own hands.

And then Miss Agnes Abbott came home for the great Thanksgiving reunion which took place in the family of the Abbott's each year without fail. Miss Abbott had been attending a missionary training school, having quite an idea of entering the foreign field, the only obstacle being the objections of her parents, whose only and idolized child she was. She was young and intense, and wonderfully interested in all lines of benevolent labor, and as soon as she heard of the strike among the miners, whose friend she had always been, her womanly sympathies were at once aroused, and she immediately set to work to find a way out of the difficulty.

"These things are always so much to be regretted," she observed to her father, "and cast such reproach upon the employers of a people. Things are not managed just right, certainly not on a Christian basis, or they would not occur. I am sure, papa, if the Golden Rule was followed as it should be, all such troubles might be avoided."

"Nonsense!" said Mr. Abbott, speaking with more sharpness and irritability than he usually manifested, especially to this daughter of his. "You do not understand what you are talking about, Agnes. Once begin to let these people have their will about things, and the end will be confusion. There is only one way to do with these ignorant miners, and that is, oblige them to come to your terms and keep them there. It is necessary they have a master, and they have a fine one in Hall Clayson. He is alike impervious to whining or threats. As for kindness, Agnes, pigs don't appreciate kindness, and these miners are pigs! They want the earth, that's what they want, and are mad because they can't have it."



"Knuckle down now, and go back at the old wage?" he said. "No, Sir!"

"Possibly they do ask unreasonable things sometimes," said Agnes, softly, yet with a quiet decision that was unanswerable. "But we are all unreasonable. Do not men in your position often ask just as unreasonable things of God as they have asked of you? Do they not fret and chafe at his way of doing things and at the burdens he lays upon them? Are they not quite as often unthankful for his mercies, are they not grasping, do they not demand at his hands a thousand times more than they deserve? Papa, both you and Mr. Clayson are Christian gentlemen; these miners have a right to look to you to manifest toward them, not the spirit of the business world, but the long-suffering, loving spirit of Christ. When they ask bread at your hands, they do not expect to be given a stone."

There was a bright red flush on Mr. Franklin Abbott's face. He looked up quickly.

"Do you mean to say to me, Agnes," he said, "that we have not given our workmen living wages? That we have starved them, absolutely denied them bread? As long as they behaved themselves I am sure they had plenty. It is their own fault if they are suffering now, not ours."

"I admit that they may have been unwise; probably they have acted exceedingly foolish; but let us put ourselves in their places, papa, for a single minute and apply the Golden Rule. Do you know what a dreadful condition their houses are in, what a reproach they are to you, their owner, papa? Do you know that they leak dreadfully, that the window-lights are half gone, and that they are all so generally out of repair as to be totally unfit to keep out the cold? Winter is coming on and they cannot be comfortable. Isn't it a little hard they must pay rent for such miserable shacks to live in? Would you like to do it, papa? I took occasion to look through several of them yesterday, and, papa dear, I did really feel ashamed that you owned them. And the store where they are obliged to get their supplies in part pay for their work—are you aware, papa, that the provisions are of the cheapest and poorest and most unwholesome character, and that the price is not correspondingly cheap, but almost as high as for standard goods? I took the liberty of examining into these things, because I had heard some of the complaints from the women, and I meant to know the truth. There is some reason in their madness, papa. It is no wonder that they rebel at this. On the other hand, I really do think it a wonder that one of the poor women, in kindness and love, warned me, yesterday, that our homes are in constant and hourly danger of being burnt over our heads, and that both your and Mr. Clayson's lives have been seriously threatened. I do not excuse them for meditating and using violence, papa, but if I were in their place I should like to be lovingly pitied, and I do believe—with all my heart I do believe—that the only way to settle this difficulty is Christ's way."

Mr. Abbott fidgeted in his chair: "If you are not an embryo missionary, Agnes," he said, pleasantly, though with a little constrained laugh, "I would say you were out of order, and call you down. But, as it is, I suppose I must be indulgent, and grant you a speaker's privilege, and let you have the floor. As to these ah miners, my dear, what is it you have in mind to do for them? Pigheaded as they are, if you are going to take up cudgels in their defense, I suppose I shall be obliged to second your efforts or be accused of acting the part of an unnatural father."

"Oh, papa, how perfectly lovely!" and Mr. Abbott's neck was immediately encircled by a pair of very loving arms. "Now, we are upon missionary ground, and I am quite sure will be able to arrange everything satisfactorily. What do I want to do for these poor people, papa? Why, I want to show them that we are interested in them; that we do really regard their welfare. I want to make them happy, papa, and get them to take a new interest in life. I want to get them to come to church and to send their children to Sunday School, but I want to make them comfortable first. It would be no good to talk Sunday School to them while they are out of work and out of money and have not half enough to eat. So, I propose, papa, as you kindly allow me to make proposals, that you send carpenters and plasterers round to the cottages at once, and set them to work making all needful repairs. And, papa, dear, as Thanksgiving is so near at hand, suppose we get up a grand dinner for them, and have it in the town-hall. Nothing takes the fight out of a man like a thoroughly good meal; now you know that."

"I don't believe you'll get Clayson to consent to it, Agnes," said Mr. Abbott, "and I really have my doubts if the miners will accept of a dinner, if it is offered them."

"Don't be troubled," said Agnes, gaily. "I know they will accept it from me. And as for Mr. Clayson, with a bright little blush, suppose you leave him to me also. I think I know how to manage him. Just let your little missionary pour oil on the troubled waters and soothe the savage breast. It will be beautiful, papa, to begin my mission work with the peacemaker's blessing: do you not think so?"

Mr. Abbott did not answer in words, but he looked thoughtful. To do him justice, he had not known the real state of affairs very well, having left everything to his superintendent concerning the mines and the miners. Now, he was minded to take a look into things himself. Immediately following his conversation with his daughter, he made a thorough inspection of the

"WONDERFUL WORDS OF LIFE"

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

THE lesson story is of an ancient Bible school. The scholars were willing-hearted. They were the people who had built the wall of Jerusalem. They came together at the signal of the blowing of trumpets with golden mouthpieces, on their New Year's day. They were desirous of beginning the New Year aright. They assembled in the public square, south of the Temple, and sent a request to Ezra the scribe to bring the law of Moses and read it to them.

The Bible is the king book in the literature of knowledge, the king book also in the literature of power. Its words are life-giving. They come into a human soul "like an influence." They also change whole communities, of which this lesson affords a representative instance. This is the supreme proof that the Bible is the best of books—that its influence is best. The writer believes it true from lid to lid, but see what Goldwin Smith has just said, though he does not believe so much: "The evidence of Christianity to people of my way of thinking, is the character which it has produced and the effect which its approximate influence has had on the progress of mankind, notwithstanding all the adverse forces, including the perversion of religion itself by Popes, Inquisitions, Jesuits, and fanatics of various kinds. No other creed, Buddhist, Mohammedan or Rousseauist, has shown such a power for good." This lesson story illustrates the individual and social influence of the Bible, that produces both penitence and philanthropy.

1. Reading the Bible Intelligently. This story of Bible reading in Jerusalem with interpretation and application is a rebuke alike to Roman Catholics, who omit Bible reading in their meetings, and to the Greek Church, which reads it as a form of book worship without interpretation or application, and to Protestants, who read it in family worship as lifelessly as if its chapters were strings of beads, or memorize it without understanding in the Sunday school. There is no magic in an unused family Bible, or in memorized verses that are not translated from English into action. "Blessed are they that hear and do." That gathering to hear the Bible in Jerusalem reminds us of many gatherings to hear it that were perilous, one of which, containing an intimation of the spirit in which we should all listen, is described in the following story, which is familiar but apropos. It was during the time of the persecution of the Scottish Covenanters. Soldiers were hunting down and killing all who dared to meet to read the Bible. The name of "Claverhouse's Dragoons" spread fear and terror, as it was whispered they spared neither old nor young. A young Highland maiden started forth to follow her father to a little dell where an aged servant of God was to read God's Word, and encourage his scattered flock to be true to the Lord. From time to time these meetings were held, most of the men attending them being armed, and some acting as scouts, to give notice of the approach of the soldiers.

Cautiously was the young girl creeping from one boulder to another on her way to this retired spot, when suddenly she caught the sound of horses' hoofs. She was then in a small open space, and scarcely had she realized that retreat was impossible, when three soldiers rode up, and bade her halt. "Do you belong to this part of the country?" asked one of them. "I do, sir," answered she quietly, though her heart quaked. "On what errand go you?" continued he. We may well believe that, like Nehemiah, the Highland lassie "prayed to the God of heaven," in that moment of terrible anxiety. Certainly wisdom from above was granted her, for she answered, "My Elder Brother has died, and His will is going to be read this afternoon. My Father has said that all the children are to have a share of His inheritance, and please, sir, I'm going to see what there is in the will for me." "Let her proceed," said the leader of the trio, urging forward his horse, and the girl was allowed to go unharmed on her way.

2. Repenting of Sin. It was the Law, the Ten Commandments and others about them, that had been read, which proved then, as always to honest hearts, a mirror to show stains of sin that needed to be washed away, and prompted tears of penitence. One cannot wash himself with a mirror, nor can he even cleanse himself in his own tears. The law does not save us, but shows our need of salvation. It is not our tears but Christ's blood that cleanses the soul. If the law of God does not make us weep, it is because we are too dull to see our sins, even when the mirror is there! or it is because we are too dull to be ashamed of them and to desire to be rid of them.

"So Ezra read in the book the Law of God, distinctly, and gave the sense"

Tom Moore, in his Paradise and the Peri, represents a peri at the gate of Paradise, who is told she will be admitted only when she has found and brought the most precious thing on earth. After many vain attempts to present what seems most precious, she comes upon a kneeling child

> Lisping the holy name of God
> With purity's own cherub mouth.

At sight of which a hardened robber, reminded of his own home and mother, drops a tear of penitence, which the peri bears as a precious pearl to the gate of heaven, and finds admittance. This is but a new setting of the Bible truth that the angels of God rejoice over a sinner that repenteth.

Sometimes the word that awakens a soul to penitence is the word of a song in which some Bible truth is echoed. A young Texan came into a revival meeting, and a lady "felt it laid upon her to give him one of the penny hymn-books in use." While she went for the book he moved to another part of the room; but she found him, and learned afterwards that the first thing his eye fell on in the book was a title that seemed like his mother's heart cry, "Where is my wandering boy to-night?" That unlocked his heart to Christ. Repentance should also include restitution, if possible. Recently there came to Batavia, N. Y., a man who went to one and another saying he had swindled them in 1897 by a plan to start an exhibition, toward which many of them contributed money and merchandise. When he disappeared, taunting his victims with Parthian letters, addressed, in "care of Dead Easy & Co.," they put down their losses on their educational account in the school of experience and never expected to see the man again. But a troubled conscience and repentance brought him back, to bear the penalty in prison, to which he was sent at his own request.

The following story is appropriate to this subject. "In a court of justice, a young man was asked whether he had aught to say why the extreme penalty should not be passed upon him. At that moment a gray-haired man, his face furrowed with sorrow, stepped into the prisoner's box unhindered, placed his hand affectionately upon the culprit's shoulder and said: 'Your honor, we have nothing to say. The verdict which has been found against us is just. We have only to ask for mercy'! 'We!' There was nothing against this old father. Yet in that moment he identified his very being with that of his wayward boy. So Christ will take his place beside us in the judgment as our advocate and friend and say: 'I have borne his penalty. My heart broke on Calvary under the burden of his sin. For my sake let him go free.'"

3. Rejoicing in God. The joy of pardon that follows sorrow for sin is one of the greatest joys earth knows, excelled only by the joy of saving others. Such was the joy that followed the tears in Jerusalem. A man and his wife were sitting in their quiet parlor, she busy with her magazine and he with curious interest reading a Bible which he had picked up. "Wife," said he, "if this book is right, we are wrong." She dropped her magazine and gazed at him curiously, and then resumed her reading. After a few minutes, he said a little more earnestly, "Wife, if this book is right, we are lost," and she stopped to talk with him over that fact and then resumed her reading. After a half hour longer he looked up and said, with a tear in his voice, "Wife, if this book is right, we may be saved." This familiar story pictures what happened in many hearts and homes in Jerusalem that Bible reading week.

A London doctor tells how he used the Roentgen X ray, which has wonderful germicidal power but no curative quality, to break down the cancerous tissue and kill the bacteria in a deep-seated cancer of the breast, and then the Finsen curative ray to heal the open sore thus made. So the law convicts and the Gospel converts the soul. A Christian's gladness begun at conversion should continue through life, unconquered by even the fear of death. The placard posted all over New Orleans during the prevalence of yellow fever, in order to prevent the spread of fear and despair, might serve valuable uses at other times than when plague is visiting a community. It read, "Wear a smile on your face and a flower in your buttonhole." You may think, in looking out upon the world, that the great difference between people is that some have many things to enjoy, and others very few. When you know them better, you will find that a greater difference is that some have great power to enjoy and others very little.

In the thick of the terrible battle of Nan-shan, just north of Port Arthur, two Japanese soldiers were wounded at the same moment. One of them, a corporal, crept to his comrade and tried to bind up his wound. The man said to him, "Don't trouble about me, look out for your own wound: I have believed in Jesus Christ." Then the corporal recited to the desperately wounded man: "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me." "Yes," responded the other, "I have been laid hold of by Jesus Christ." At that moment a second bullet struck the speaker and he died. The corporal lived to reach the hospital, and to tell the Christian nurse of this communion of souls on the battlefield.

4. Relieving the Needy. If repentance and religion be genuine there will be glad "sending to them for whom nothing is provided, as at Jerusalem," and other sweet fruits in kindness to man and beast. The Congregationalist tells how the very horses have benefited by the revival in Wales: "Horses in the mines that have known nothing but profanity and obscenity as language of command, now know not what to do since their masters are converted men. The latter cannot swear as they did, and the horses are too thoroughly disciplined to the old expletives to take up instantly with a more moral and pious terminology of command." With that story may well go another, of a little child wearing the cross of the King's Daughters, who, being asked what she did as a King's Daughter, replied, "I don't pinch the baby anymore."

A seven-year-old Junior Endeavorer, wrote the Japanese Endeavor that she is one of eight Juniors who had twenty sen each to buy flowers for the sick Russian prisoners. They visited between seventy and eighty, in fifteen wards, and when the flowers gave out, they sang for the Russians.

AROUND THE HOME HEARTH

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

A Question of Nerves

ARE nervous diseases on the increase in America? It would almost seem so. We hear far more than of old about nervous exhaustion, nervous prostration, and other forms of more or less obscure disease, which were once completely unknown. If troubles of this sort are growing common, there must be a cause. Probably we all live under too great pressure, with too little leisure, and without the mental poise and the physical rest which keep people in full health and vigor. Americans are high strung and excitable, easily irritated, and very much in the habit of attempting to crowd two days' work into one. In consequence, many of us live in a state of chronic fatigue, and either have to give up our tasks in the middle of our days, or else fall out of the ranks, and are invalided long before it is time for us to withdraw from activity. Among the potent causes of nervous breakdown, worry must take first place. It is hardly too much to say that some people are worried into their graves. They worry about themselves, about their children, the weather, the temperature, their finances, and the future. If they are happy to-day, they are very much afraid that they will be miserable to-morrow. If things are going right now, they fully expect that they will somehow go wrong before the end of the week or the year. Worry is a vicious habit, which eats like rust into the fabric of life.

Another reason that accounts for exhaustion too soon is found in the ambitious attempt to make as good an appearance as our neighbor, if not to surpass him. Many of us would rub along very contentedly with shabby curtains and half-worn carpets, knowing that they were clean and whole, if we were not tormented by comparison with the exquisite lace curtains in our neighbor's house, and the fact that her rugs are new and costly. The effort continually to put the best foot forward wears men and women out before their prime. Some of us carry too much sail. We are always a little in excess of what we should be, in every sort of expenditure. We are prodigal of time, health and money, and in the end we are bankrupt. Outside of ourselves there is a good deal of wear and tear on the nerves of both citizens and suburban dwellers, in the incessant clang and clamor of the automobiles in summer, in the roar of railway trains and the fiendish outcry of steam whistles. Occasionally people exclaim against the sound of church bells, and one hears a charge made that they disturb invalids and old people. But what shall be said of a whistle common now in factories, which wails like a banshee, howls like a dog, hoots like an owl, and moans like a lost soul, all in combination? Three or four times a day those who dwell within a mile of certain mills and factories have their ears pierced by this chaos of sound, as if an inferno were loose above their heads.

No doubt many of us, by an effort of the will and by the cultivation of serenity, could rise above disturbing conditions and possess our souls in peace. We are told that under the deep sea, however agitated may be the surface, there is always tranquillity, if one but goes far enough down. Beneath the restless clamor of this world, there may be heaven's own tranquillity for those who believe in Christ, accept his gifts and live for him. Whatever may be the environment, it is the Christian's privilege to be ensphered in an atmosphere of calm, and, so to live, as if all about were hushed and still. "My peace I give unto you," said Jesus, "not as the world giveth."

But what shall we do if we are very busy, and the children are trying, and the dinner is spoiled, and we have cut our dress pattern wrong, and we can get no more material, and things are provokingly awry? What shall we do if we are the victims of insomnia, or are tortured by the national horror dyspepsia? What shall we do if we are in the condition which is described as being as nervous as a witch, or, if we run down, and see no chance of getting a change? Fortunate people there are who step on shipboard and try the benefit of ocean breezes when they are nervous. Others, go to an orange grove, or an Adirondack Lodge, or a rural village deep in shade away from the usual haunts. It is our duty to stay at home. What can we do there? We may resolve every day to secure a little regular rest. We may cut down expenses, take more hours of sleep, and cultivate the art of looking on the bright side. If we do this, living as much as we can in the open air, eating plain food, and drinking an abundance of water, either cold or hot, avoiding drugs and stimulants, we shall, even at home, triumph over disordered nerves.

We must not forget that with increasing wealth and luxury we have developed a class of enfeebled folk, who, morally at least, are degenerates from the old standard. They are well depicted by Mrs. Wharton in The House of Mirth. These people live to kill time, not to use it wisely. They are in hot pursuit of pleasure at any cost, and, among them, women fail into nervous disease from sheer force of ennui; from having too little to do and from reckless selfishness. Such a class is dangerous to the true vitality of America.

Memorizing the Bible

IT used to be much more the rule than it is to-day for children to memorize texts of Scripture and to lay up for future use, when the mind was most receptive, passages from the Psalms and the Gospels. At present, although theoretically we praise the Bible and look upon it with reverence as the Book of inspiration, it is much to be feared that it is a neglected Book in thousands of Christian families. Children do not read it, nor do their parents. In our higher schools and colleges there is a singular ignorance of the Bible shown by students who are not familiar with its characters, who do not know Bible stories, and who, while seeking other knowledge, fail to garner that which has been given us by God himself in his own Book. The Bible is an authoritative guide in faith and morals. No one may presume to be well educated who does not know this precious Book. No mother is doing her full duty to her children if she does not daily teach them something from its pages. The mere reading of the Bible is not enough to satisfy the real needs of the heart. Every child should know so thoroughly that it never can be forgotten, most of the Sermon on the Mount. The Beatitudes are easily learned and easily fixed in memory. A child should learn by heart the Ten Commandments, the fourteenth and fifteenth chapters of John, and many of the Psalms. A verse or two a day will be treasure that time and trouble can never take away. For what is learned in youth is remembered in age. In childhood the mind is wax to receive and marble to retain. Let us not forget that childhood is fast flying by, so that what we are to do in this direction must be done quickly.

Is It Worth While?

Is it really worth while to talk so much as we are doing just now about our multi-millionaires, their methods, their gifts, their luxuries, their wigs or their bald heads, the food they eat, their personal habits, their tears and their smiles? It would almost seem as if these gentlemen were occupying an undue proportion of our time and thought. There is nothing extraordinary just now in the rich American. Numbers of Americans are extremely rich. Some of them make a good use of their wealth; others are avaricious and sordid. They are probably not so very unlike the rest of us in their way of disposing of what God has given them. The point we would make is that simply because a man has amassed great wealth he need not be pushed into a place where every one sees and talks about him. The great statesman, the great poet, the great painter, the great commander, has a right to be considered and made much of by his contemporaries. The man of enormous wealth has simply accumulated more of the gold and silver, which modern people worship, than his neighbor has been able to do. He may or may not be fortunate, but why should he take up too much of other people's time?

Rapid Transit

What would our Puritan ancestors have said could they have imagined the headlong pace of our rapid traveling in the twentieth century? Miss Alice Roosevelt and her party, having made what might be called a meteoric trip from the Far East by the sea, proceeded to run across the continent at a speed of ninety miles an hour, by a schedule that secured a special night car for the train. No doubt it was very pleasant for the young lady and her traveling companions to make this home-bound trip in this tremendously hurrying fashion. Yet, as no one was ill and her parents were away from home, on the Presidential Southern trip, one wonders what was the reason for such haste. Possibly it was just by way of contrast with the dreamy and leisurely East.

Everybody is glad that Miss Roosevelt, who has been lovingly adopted as a sort of daughter of the nation into a million homes, is safe back from her pilgrimage.

Music Lessons Free

IN YOUR OWN HOME

A wonderful offer to every lover of music, whether a beginner or an advanced player.

Ninety-six lessons (or a less number if you desire) for either Piano, Organ, Violin, Guitar, Banjo, Cornet, or Mandolin, will be given free to make our home study courses for these instruments known in your locality. You will get one lesson weekly, and your only expense during the time you take the lessons will be the cost of postage and the music you use, which is small. Write at once. It will mean much to you to get our free booklet. It will place you under no obligation whatever to us if you never write again. You and your friends should know of this work. Hundreds of our pupils write: "Wish I had known of your school before." "Have learned more in one term in my home with your weekly lessons than in three terms with private teachers, and at a great deal less expense." "Everything is so thorough and complete." "The lessons are marvels of simplicity, and my 11-year old boy has not had the least trouble to learn." One minister writes: "As each succeeding lesson comes I am more and more fully persuaded I made no mistake in becoming your pupil."

We have been established seven years — have hundreds of pupils from eight years of age to seventy. Don't say you cannot learn music till you send for our free booklet and tuition offer. It will be sent by return mail free. Address U. S. SCHOOL OF MUSIC, Box C. H., 19 Union Square, New York City.

Thanksgiving Days

THY goodness toward us, Lord, is great
More than our lips can tell;
And we thy love must celebrate,
And say that all is well.

Thy mercies let us now make known,
Thy bounties oft bestowed,
Thy loving kindnesses, wide strewn
Along our pilgrim road.

Thou hast been kind to our desires,
Thou givest peace profound,
Where we may pray by altar fires,
And tread on hallowed ground.

For troubled ones—the sad—the lone—
Who drink from bitter springs,
Let trial be a stepping-stone
To mount to higher things.

Through everything, thanks may we give,
And bear a heart of praise;
And make of all the days we live
True, glad Thanksgiving days.

Peace

FROM the bugles that called to the battle, and thud of the armies' tread;
From the murderous swords uplifted, with their sharp blades running red;
From the agonized cries of the wounded, and horses, trampling the dead—
Lo! the sudden release of the White Dove of Peace and the blue of the Summer o'erhead.

From the hidden mines' awful explosions, and cannons' thundering boom;
From the bloody waves drinking the dying, and the running of Hell's vast loom;
From the nations enwrapt in conflict, and their rulers enwrapt in gloom—
Lo! the sudden release of the White Dove of Peace and the lilies of Summer a-bloom.

From the lion-souled patriots fighting no grimness of Death could appal;
From the mothers that went forth unweeping, and gave to the country their all.
With desolate hearts as of Rachel,' and stony despairs, as of Saul—
Lo! the sudden release of the White Dove of Peace and the whole world held in thrall.

From the bugles that called to the battle blow pæans to East and to West,
That shall reach to Earth's lowliest valleys from mountains supremest confest,
That shall gladden the souls of the angels, in the music of angels expressed,
For the sudden release of the White Dove of Peace, that was winged from Jehovah's breast.

THE Price of one of our garments made to your order, delivered at your address, complete and ready to wear, is less than your dressmaker would ask for making alone.

Money is not the only thing we save you; shopping trips, long delays, tiresome fittings, and the hundred and one little worries of dressmaking—you forget all of them when you deal with us, for your troubles ends when you mail us your order. We commence work on your garment the day the order reaches us, and it is shipped to you within one week.

We will return your money if we fail to fit you perfectly

We have customers near you to whom we can refer, if you wish to investigate our standing and methods. Here is an example of the letters that come in every mail.

"I received my suit a few days ago and am delighted with it. It fits lovely—not an alteration needed. This was my first order, but when in need of anything else, shall get it from you. Thank you for your promptness.
Miss Laura Ellis, Barnesville, Pa."

Rev. W. E. Biederwolf

Paul J. Gilbert

Missouri Again Stirred by a Revival

AMONG those who were associated with the evangelistic movement conducted by Rev. Wilbur F. Chapman, in the campaign of last year, was Rev. W. E. Biederwolf, of Monticello, Indiana, a man of deep consecration and scholarly attainments, whose influence in the evangelistic field has been attended with remarkable results. A few days ago there was concluded at Springfield, Mo., a series of tent meetings conducted by Mr. Biederwolf, which were the most notable of any ever held in the history of that city, resulting in the awakening of the churches and, it is claimed, in the registration of more than 1,400 conversions during the twenty days' services. The large tent, accommodating some 2,500, was crowded beyond its capacity night after night, while frequently hundreds were unable to get even within hearing distance.

On the occasion of the "midweek Sabbath" the merchants of the city closed their places of business from 10 to 12 A.M., and attended a service especially conducted for them. The tent was again taxed to its utmost capacity. One prominent business man, converted in that service, arose in an after-meeting, and, addressing those present, said: "Men, you've endorsed my checks, as we've done business with one another; now, I want you to endorse me in this move I've made by giving your hearts to God."

On the evening of the same day, near midnight, a great crowd of Christian men and women marched through the "tenderloin" district of the city, singing rousing Gospel songs, and inviting people to a meeting at the leading opera house. The latter was soon filled by the paraders, and the denizens of the district through which they had passed, and at the close of a brief address by Evangelist Biederwolf, and the singing of "Tell Mother I'll be there," by Paul J. Gilbert, the tenor singer, a great number came to the front and announced their acceptance of Christ. Among them were several of the fallen women of the district.

During the progress of the meetings two special services were conducted for men only. At the first, more than two hundred men confessed Christ. The whole city was profoundly stirred when the news of this result was reported. At the second meeting, held some few days later, another great gathering of men greeted the speaker, and a large number professed conversion amid scenes of tearful rejoicing.

Another noteworthy fact connected with the revival, was the interest manifested by the students of Drury College. So great was their enthusiasm, that on one occasion practically the whole student body marched to the tent through the streets, singing the "Glory Song" to the accompaniment of the college band. It was the first time, perhaps, that the students of this college had ever shown any special interest in evangelistic meetings. Several members of the faculty also became enthusiastic.

Rev. Mr. Biederwolf has associated with him in his work Paul J. Gilbert, who has just returned from England, where he was special soloist in the Torrey Alexander evangelistic meetings, and Mr. Homer Rodeheaver of Tennessee, who has charge of the chorus work.

Last Week of the Women's Memorial

THE time for getting signatures for the Women's Memorial to the United States Senate, protesting against the seating of Reed Smoot in that body, is drawing to a close. None can be received after the end of this week. We would therefore urge all who are interested in this matter to use every effort in the limited time left to secure signatures to this petition, and to send them in at the earliest possible date.

Preparations are being made to have the Memorial presented to the Senate with the dignity which the cause and movement demands. There are many women, no doubt, who have not yet heard of the women's war on polygamy and have not had an opportunity of joining the ranks. It is not yet too late to send in your own names, nor too late to urge this duty upon every woman of your acquaintance, not only to sign, but to get their friends also to give their signatures.

That there is but one side to the Mormon question, outside of Mormondom, is attested every day by the long list of signatures received daily at Memorial headquarters, Bible House, New York, and by the letters that accompany these petitions. Women are working all over the country, doing all in their power to stamp out the monstrous wrong of plural marriages, with all its attendant evils and heartbreaks.

Members of Women's Organizations are sending in their names in great numbers, all expressing a fervent desire that this plague-spot be removed from our land. Many women say that if it were lawful, they would sign their names a thousand times.

We would ask the secretaries of a number of clubs, who have been instructed to sign for their organization as a body, to kindly send us a list of membership, that we may append the names to the petition. In some instances the number of members of the club is not given.

Among the Clubs and other Women's Societies that have sent in their protest recently, against the retention of the Mormon Apostle in the Senate, are "The Harriet Steven's Club" of Dayton, O.; the "St. Louis Chapter of D. A. R's;" "The Town Improvement Asso'n" of Rutherford, N. J.; "The Woman's Home and Foreign Missionary Society of the Lutheran Church of Western Pennsylvania Synod," numbering 2,640 members; "The Nineteenth Century Club," of Corsicana, Tex.; "The Seattle Federation of Women's Clubs," 600 membership; "The Washington State Federation of Women's Clubs," 2,000 members, and many others.

At a mass meeting held in Olivet Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, on Oct. 15, 1905, Rev. L. G. Graham pastor, the following was signed and forwarded to the Senators addressed:

"We the undersigned citizens of Philadelphia, Pa., do hereby petition the Hon. Boies Penrose and Philander C. Knox to vote in committee and on the floor of the Senate, for the exclusion of Reed Smoot from the Senate of the United States."

Emerson

"A firm foundation makes a firm house"

Mr. W. P. Emerson, who built the first Emerson Piano 55 years ago, was a skilled and practical musician. His foremost aim was to produce an instrument whose splendid tone-quality, perfect action and lasting endurance, the most exacting critic could not fail to admire.

From this foundation-ideal — conscientiously adhered to by three generations of his successors—has grown that superb modern instrument, the Emerson of to-day.

Questions and Answers

Letters for this department must contain name and address of the sender—not for publication, but in order that an answer may be sent by mail in cases where the inquiry is not of general interest.

J. S. R., Potter Valley, Calif. We are pleased with the stand you take upon the Mormon question. Why should it be lawful and respectable in Utah, and unlawful and a disgrace in California, for a man to have more than one wife?

It is no more lawful in Utah than in your own State for a man to commit bigamy or polygamy. It never has been lawful, and the offense "against the laws of God and man," which President Smith and other polygamous Mormons confessed before the Senate Committee, is an offense which will not exist much longer, even in Utah. The whole moral sentiment of the nation is against it and the legal machinery of the government will stamp it out.

L. H. F., Alexandria, N. Y. 1. Did Saul inquire of the Lord, as stated in I. Samuel 28: 6, or not inquire of him, as stated in I. Chron. 10: 14? 2. Is it wrong for Christians to consult clairvoyants, fortune-tellers, etc.?

1. The author of Chronicles is believed to have been a Levite, probably a musician devoted to the Temple and its worship. His work partakes more of the character of a sermon than of historical narrative. In many places, besides the one you refer to, he differs from the more careful historians of Samuel and Kings. He was by nature a poet, intent rather on enforcing moral lessons than on recording the exact facts. In this instance he doubtless regards Saul's inquiry as a mere pretense, not a real seeking after God. The king was alarmed and his inquiry was not rightly directed, and, as the chronicler seems to imply, no inquiry at all. 2. It is both wrong and foolish, as Isaiah said, when people urge you to, "Seek unto them that have familiar spirits and unto wizards that peep and that mutter; should not a people seek unto their God?"

York, Berwick, Pa. 1. Is there a book on United States law, similar in style to the English books, Every Man His Own Lawyer, and Law without Lawyers? 2. Outline the course of action that would have to be pursued by a young man who has a fairly good education (not college), who wished to become a lawyer.

1. There are several books such as "York" refers to. Write to Baker, Voorhis & Co., 47 Liberty Street, New York, for a list, with prices. 2. The best course is to enter a law school, which does not require a college diploma for entrance. The next best thing is to obtain admission to the office of a busy practising attorney as a clerk, not as a mere student. From the standpoint of a clerkship, "York" will soon see for himself what is the next thing to do. Any course of action varies at every step, according to the peculiar circumstances surrounding the student. G. H. C.

N. M. S., Tekamah, Neb. You have omitted to mention, in your defense of capital punishment, that God himself set the first great precedent when, instead of smiting down Cain for the murder of Abel, he set a mark upon him, "lest any finding him should kill him." The ancient laws which Moses gave in the Wilderness, though not abrogated, have been greatly modified. Men and women are no longer deprived of life for offenses now deemed trivial. Only a few generations ago, sheep stealing and robbery were punished with death in England, and so-called "witches" were executed in New England. These things could not be done to-day. Christ forgave his murderers and we, as his followers, should be no less forgiving and allow them at least the opportunity to repent.

C. H. B., Lebanon, Pa. 1. What reasons do astronomers give for the fact that this earth was chosen for human habitation instead of some prodigious star? 2. What proof is there for the assertion that space is infinite? 3. Is it reasonably certain that infinite space is an endless, starry heaven?

1. The questioner assumes as a fact that the earth is the only inhabited world. Our little earth is a planet, while the stars are self-shining suns, of which our sun is a nearby example; each one, no doubt, filling a like office—guiding, warming, lighting and fertilizing dark revolving planets, where possibly beings like ourselves may be dwelling. The Bible (Isaiah 45: 18), says the earth would have been created in vain if not inhabited, from which, we may infer, that all the eight planets belonging to our solar system have been, now are, or hereafter will, like the earth, be inhabited, statements that will never be proved while our home is here. More than 500,000,000 stars are visible through our telescopes, and depicted on our photographic plates, all lighting and warming inhabited planets, unless made in vain. 2. Space is nothing, and without beginning or ending, length, breadth or depth, inside or outside, therefore endless. 3. As far as our telescopes and photographic instruments carry us, stars exist, and, where the limit is, we know not, only that when more powerful instruments are used, more stars are revealed. LEWIS SWIFT, F.R.A.S.C.
Marathon, N. Y.

E. W. B., Mishawaka, Ind., sends this letter, which will give a suggestion to many who are engaged in similar work:

One year ago, I was placed in charge of a class of eleven boys, ranging in age from eleven to fifteen years. They, like genuine boys, were uneasy and ambitious, and I have very little use for the boy that is not. We organized a club with eleven charter members. The officers were: President, Vice-President, Secretary and Treasurer. We adopted a constitution and by-laws. We meet on the last Friday evening of each month. Our dues are five cents per month. Our amusements are such as meet the approval of the teacher. The name by which we are known is E. W. C. (meaning "Earnest Workers for Christ"). We enjoy enthusiastic club meetings following a regular order of business, after which the club enjoys light refreshments. We meet at the home of one of the pupils, enjoy sleighrides, "hayracks," socials, etc. We now have a membership of twenty-four, and this evening are entertained by the pastor and wife.

At this season, when we are overwhelmed with business letters, it is refreshing to find one like this (from Mrs. C. M., Armada, Mich.), with its fervent greeting.

May the blessings of earth
And the blessings of heaven
Health and long life
Unto you be given.
To sow each day
With a faith sublime
The "seed" for the Master's
"Harvest time."

Here is an opportunity for Young Peoples' Societies to do a good work unostentatiously. The Black Mountain Academy, Pennington Gap, Lee Co., Va., is a mountain school in the "feud territory," and is attended by some one hundred and fifty boys and girls, regular wee mountain lads and lasses. It is thirty miles from the nearest railroad. T. J. Snell, the principal, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in their behalf. Many are poorly clad and shoeless. The weather gets below zero in these hills, and there can be no school in winter for the children unless some kind friends come to their aid. A few boxes of good, sound, cast off garments and shoes, sent prepaid to the care of W., C. Turner, Evarts, Ky., would cause much rejoicing.

Reader, Charlotte, N. C. I have taken my mother to live in my family. She seems inclined to want things about our home managed differently from what my wife likes. If I object, she becomes offended. If I consent, I feel I am not doing my wife justice. I want to do right in regard to both. What should I do?

Yours is a very difficult position and one in which it is well-nigh impossible to give advice of any practical value. The wife and the mother should each make an effort to be mutually forbearing, but if the question of the final authority in domestic affairs arises, it must rest with the wife. Still, if she be tactful and gentle, she will be able to avoid needless friction, and she might even be able to make the mother feel that her counsel and advice are helpful in many matters.

Reader, Columbus, Ohio. I see by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that it costs $15 a year to redeem a little African child and fit it for missionary work. Will you kindly state through THE MAIL-BAG how many years a child is supposed to be in training, or, in other words, the amount of money required to so train a child?

It must depend somewhat upon the age of the child when adopted and taken under the missionary's care. A fair average for a child adopted at six or seven years of age would be probably about eight years. At fifteen the child would be grown and sufficiently instructed to send out as a worker in the heathen villages. Only certain children develop the necessary qualifications, so it might be advisable for you to adopt one who is promising and somewhat advanced.

A New and Wonderful Musical Instrument

$100. CASH PRIZE

FOR THE BEST MUSICAL COMPOSITION ARRANGED TO PLAY ON THE

"DOLCEOLA"

We will pay $100.00 in cash to the person sending to us, prior to Christmas, Dec. 25th, 1905, the best musical composition arranged to play on the DOLCEOLA.

In order that you may see just what arrangement is necessary for the DOLCEOLA, we will send you, free, our illustrated book, "THE DOLCEOLA," which fully describes the instrument and keyboard, and also give you all necessary information so you can compete intelligently for this $100.00 prize. Every contestant will receive a handsome souvenir, even if they don't win the big prize, and every composition which we retain we will pay a liberal price for.

Write us to-day, for it costs you nothing, and, at least, you will get a handsome souvenir.

This new instrument is equal in tone volume to two guitars and two mandolins, while it is played with keys like the piano.

The great simplicity with which the novice can produce sweet music is the DOLCEOLA'S greatest charm. For children's use it is a most charming and economical stepping-stone to the piano, and will tend to develop in the child God's most exquisite gift—music.

Write for our book, whether or not you desire to compete for the prize, as we know you will want the "Dolceola" after learning exactly what it is, and the fine music that can be obtained from it.

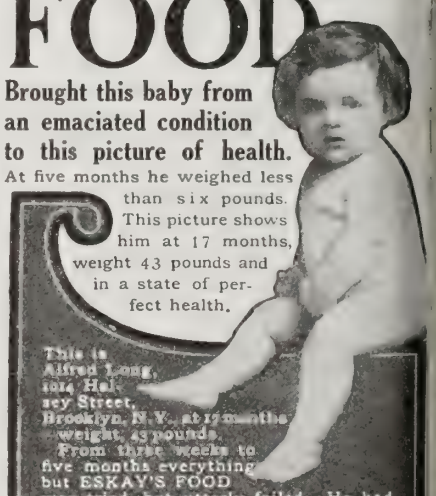
ESKAY'S FOOD

Brought this baby from an emaciated condition to this picture of health.

At five months he weighed less than six pounds. This picture shows him at 17 months, weight 43 pounds and in a state of perfect health.



This is Alfred Long, 1014 Halsey Street, Brooklyn, N. Y., at 17 months, weight, 43 pounds.

From three weeks to five months everything but ESKAY'S FOOD was tried, but utterly failed. He had Meningitis, Whooping Cough, Pneumonia and Cholera Infantum, and when started on ESKAY'S FOOD at five months was so emaciated that he weighed but six pounds. He improved from the start on ESKAY'S FOOD and made a complete recovery to perfect health upon it. His doctor calls it "the most wonderful case" he ever saw, and gives ESKAY'S all credit for bringing about the change.

We will send free to any one the story in detail how Baby Long's life was saved.

A generous sample of ESKAY'S FOOD will be sent free, together with our helpful book "How to Care for the Baby."

S. L., Yonkers, N. Y. Who was the first colonial governor of Massachusetts?

John Winthrop, born in Groton, England, in 1588; died in Boston, April 5, 1676. He came first to Salem, but moved to Boston in 1649. His son John was governor of an English colony in Connecticut.

R. D., Troy, N. Y. Where did civilization begin in what part of the globe? Is there any really reliable information on this point, or is it all scientific conjecture?

Explorers who have made a study of the progress of the race, as it is disclosed in the ancient monuments and the excavations of buried cities, cannot agree as to any definite starting-point of what we call civilization. In Babylonia and Assyria, statues and inscriptions have been found which would seem to indicate that a civilized people existed there nearly seven thousand years ago. The November issue of The National Geographic Magazine contains a remarkable article on the excavations in Turkestan, by Mr. Raphael Pumpelly, which have led him to conclude that Central Asia was the real birthplace of civilization. In Russian Turkestan there are believed to be hundreds, perhaps thousands of square miles of buried cities and towns, now covered by waterless desert. These cities are supposed to have been abandoned because of lack of water. The whole region is, with the exception of a few localities, untouched as yet by the explorer and antiquarian.

Old Reader, Ia. When and where was the Farmers' Alliance founded?

In 1873, in Texas. Its object was the protection of farmers against horse thieves, but it far outgrew its original scope. The People's Party is an outgrowth of the Alliance.

C. D. F., Augusta, Me. Can you tell me when Eliot's Indian Bible was published, and whether there are any copies of the book now in existence? How old was John Eliot at the time he engaged in this translation of the Bible?

In 1650, when John Eliot was pastor of a church at Roxbury, Mass., he began the study of the Natick Indian dialect, with a view of translating the Bible into that language. He completed his labors in eight years, and the book was issued in 1663. Upwards of a thousand copies were printed, twenty of which were dedicated to King Charles. The latter copies were so rare, that in 1862 one sold in the United States for $1,000.

Lenore, Grand River. In what poem do the following lines occur:

"Better fifty years of Europe
Than a cycle of Cathay."

You will find them in the poem entitled, "Locksley Hall," written by Alfred Tennyson.

Reader, Van Orin, Ill. When, where and how did the Halloween custom originate?

It is an old Scotch superstitious form of observing All-Hallows Eve. According to the old legends, the spirits of earth and air hold annual holiday on that occasion. All-Hallows (or All-Saints) was first decreed as a festival of the Roman Church in the year 610, at the time when heathen observances were substituted for many of the ancient heathen feasts.

A. D., Bronxville, N. Y. 1. What is the total membership of the various fraternal orders in the United States and Canada? 2. What is the number of fraternities in both countries?

1. In 1901, the total membership was 6,102,663. There are thirty-eight that have a membership of over 8,000. 2. There are a large number with only a few hundred names on their lists.

Please Renew this Month

This issue of The Christian Herald should reach our subscribers on or before Nov. 26, four days before the close of the month. I would ask all those whose subscriptions expire during November, December or January, to favor us NOW with their renewals, so as to reach this office as near November 30 as possible. This would be a very great help to me next month, when the business resulting from new subscriptions will tax our facilities to the very utmost. Have you renewed?

Mrs. F. A., Newark, O. What river is called the River of Life, what is its location, and why is it so named?

The "River of Life" is mentioned in Rev. 22: 1, and it typifies the full, free and pure grace of the Gospel and the uninterrupted existence enjoyed by the redeemed ones. Travelers record that the Nile, because of its fruitfulness, enriching the fields, supplying all Egypt with sustenance, was sometimes called "the river of life."

Louise Palfrey, Macon, Mo., writes:

C. R. E., Jerry City, O., in MAIL-BAG, October 25th, omits one very important difference between Utah Mormonism and the Reorganized Church of Latter Day Saints. The Utah Church places the "living oracles" first. The Reorganized Church places the books first, the Bible being the standard of evidence by which they test the other books and purported revelations. This difference between the churches accounts for the existing facts why in precept and practice the Reorganized Church is in accordance with the laws of God and the land, and the Utah Church is not.

D. F. C., Lockhart, S. C. Was Darius a heathen?

Darius the Mede, who is probably referred to, was the immediate predecessor of Cyrus, and as the Bible record tells us that "Daniel prospered in the reign of Darius," he was doubtless a comparatively just and liberal-minded monarch. He was, however, a heathen, worshiping the gods of the Medo-Persian people, which were substantially those of the whole Aryan race.

St. Quentin, Mont. What is the meaning of the word "Giaour," and how is it pronounced?

"Giaour," is one who disbelieves the Mohammedan faith. It does not imply an insult, having about the same force as the word Gentile, which means, "not a Jew." The word is a corruption of the Arabic Kiafir, and is pronounced Jour-er.

W. S. V. D., Alton, N. Y. What nations and tribes of Asia, besides the Chinese and Japanese, use characters in writing their languages instead of letters and spelling?

Turks, Persians, natives of Hindustan, Burma, Assam, Java, and many others, all use characters that seem as strange to foreigners as the writings of Japanese and Chinese.

S. A. M., Watervliet, N. Y. Will you kindly answer through THE MAIL-BAG the meaning of Selah?

It is simply a word or term which indicates a musical pause.

Beautiful and Instructive

"The Cruise of the Eight Hundred" received. I wish to thank you for giving me an opportunity for possessing such a beautiful and instructive book. I was very much interested in the cruise at the time, as one of our ministers, Dr. Henry, was one of the delegates. I was also interested through reading the Sunday School Times.

That Nations Are Growing Friendlier

By Governor Henry Roberts, of Connecticut

For more than anything else I feel that the world in general ought to be thankful that peace reigns and not war, and that the nations of the earth, bound together by mutual interests, are preparing to live together as friends and to settle disputes by arbitration rather than by the sword.

I feel, too, that the world in general ought to be thankful for the spirit of friendliness and of humanity which is, more than ever before, touching all the relations of men, and that the nations are aiding each other in promoting the welfare and progress of all the peoples of the earth.

The American people ought to be especially grateful for their continued prosperity; for their liberties: and for their wisely directed government. Prosperity and a free government have brought many blessings, and yet many wrongs have grown with them. Ought we not to be thankful for the spirit of righteous condemnation which is making wrong to cease in high places? Above all, ought we not to be thankful for the service that we as a people can render humanity, and in offering our good offices in furthering the ends of peace?

Hartford, Conn. HENRY ROBERTS.

For a Better Understanding Between Capital and Labor

By Rev. Amory H. Bradford, Montclair, N. J.

The whole world, as the Thanksgiving season approaches, has reason, first of all, to give thanks at the return of peace, and for the growing sentiment in favor of the settlement of international differences by peaceful arbitration rather than by the sword. Among the many blessings for which Americans have reason to be thankful, three seem to me to be especially prominent:

1. For the fact that Theodore Roosevelt is President of the United States.

2. For the wide-spread ethical revival, which is evident in all parts of the land, and which is demanding honesty in business and refusing to tolerate corruption in public life.

3. For the signs presaging a better understanding between capital and labor.

There are many dark clouds on our national horizon, but the sky is not altogether unpropitious when such facts as these are evident in the life of the republic. AMORY H. BRADFORD.

For Better Realization of Citizenship Duties

By Governor Albert E. Mead, of Washington

It seems to me that the chief things for which the American people are to be thankful for at this season, are: The fact that it has been given to this Republic to lead the warring nations of the world to peace; the fact that a remarkable prosperity exists throughout the land; and the further fact that there appears to be spreading over the entire country a better realization of the duties and responsibilities of American citizenship.

That the Hand of God is with Us Every Day

By Dr. David Starr Jordan, President Stanford University

We are thankful for the help of the great growing array of past human experience which we call science, and which enables the wise man to cure sickness, to alleviate pain, to forestall the pestilence to weld the whole human race into one great mutually helpful family.

We are thankful that in past times men have lived, men wise, brave, God-fearing, who have struggled against ignorance, prejudice, superstition and violence, seeing the light of better times to come, which are come, and indeed are here.

We are thankful that the hand of God is with us every day, painting the flowers and the sunset, swelling the golden harvests, tempering the wind and the storm, pouring out the song of birds and the prattle of children, and ever and "instantly renewing the work of creation."

DAVID STARR JORDAN.

For Growing Individual Honesty

By John Philip Sousa

The advice given in the older days by the Quaker to his son, "Get money, my son; get it honestly if you can, but get it," does not strike the man of to-day who has any regard for his standing in the community, as particularly honorable advice. I believe that one of the reasons for Thanksgiving is, that individual honesty is greater to-day than ever before, and is shown by the disinterested work of the individual in hunting down corporate dishonesty. In other words, winkable methods, long in vogue by corporations are becoming intolerable, owing to the higher sense of honor of man generally.

A second cause for Thanksgiving is the decrease in the number of laws that are made for the oppression of man. Right is asserting itself more each day, while might is being surely driven to the rear.

I believe there is more love in the world, for it seems there is more beauty; and love begets beauty. Another good reason for Thanksgiving.

JOHN PHILIP SOUSA.

For the Safeguarding of Our Homes

By Anthony Comstock

We have great reason to be thankful for the more than thirty-seven millions of boys and girls, twenty-one years of age and under, in this country, and that public sentiment is becoming more and more enlightened in their behalf, and that our courts are rising to a higher plane in the administration of laws designed to preserve public morality.

As a nation, we also ought to be thankful for the fact that the ports of this country are open to receive the poor and oppressed of all nations, and that we are capable of receiving the millions of emigrants without having our institutions of government overthrown or checked, by the introduction of these foreign influences.

It is a matter of especial thanksgiving, that religious liberty is maintained, and that all men are free to worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences.

If you will permit me, I think it is a source of national thanksgiving that we have such papers as The Christian Herald and other religious papers, to maintain a high moral standard, and set before the people for their thought and meditation, subjects of the highest importance from a moral and religious standpoint. The religious press of to-day safeguards our institutions by exalting righteousness and rebuking that which is evil.

For the Opportunity Peace Gives for Development

By Congressman John Sharp Williams, of Mississippi

Speaking for all places at all times, the chief thing to be thankful for when it is firmly held in possession, is peace, and the opportunity which peace gives for the development and progress, industrially, intellectually and morally. Speaking for this specific American people, however, at this specific time, it is possibly true that they might devote themselves with more profit than to anything else, to rendering thanks to God that they are not any prouder of themselves than they are—though how they could be I am somewhat at a loss to conceive.

Yazoo City, Miss. JOHN S. WILLIAMS.

That Ours Is the Good Samaritan Age

By Mrs. Sarah J. Bird

In writing of the greatest cause for thanksgiving to-day, from my own standpoint, I would say the breaking down of the barrier between the poor and morally diseased, and for those whose inheritance has given them strength, not only to stand themselves, but to uphold the helpless brother. The time is past for the reaching out of almsgiving and then passing by on the other side. We must give ourselves. This is the age of the personal touch. I like to think of this as the Good Samaritan Age.

The time was seventeen years ago, when I first entered rescue work on the East Side, that sin and wretchedness were so deeply hidden away, that it seemed impossible to conceive any way of leading these unfortunates out of their wretched condition. After years of bitter experience in rescue work my heart goes out in thanksgiving to the contrast to-day; that the barrier is largely broken down by the influence of the Christ spirit which brought about the overcoming of evil with good. There is a spirit kindled in the altar of our homes that is going out to penetrate the ignorance and depravity of the masses, for the conscience of the community never was so high as to-day; the movement of the middle and lower classes is a movement for stronger and better manhood.

New York City. MRS. SARAH J. BIRD.

Other Answers

Rev. Cortland Myers (Baptist), Brooklyn, N. Y., thanks God "for a public sentiment that is growing in a moral sense; also for a deepening belief in the power of the spiritual." Bishop Geo. F. Seymour (Episcopal), Springfield, Ills., for "the blessing that has brought us into closer relations with the Prince of Peace." Bishop O. P. Fitzgerald (M. E.) of Nashville, for the "signs of the fulfilment of the promise of universal peace." Gen. O. O. Howard, for "the great peace that is making itself felt all around the globe, and for the privileges of our mountain youth, which have grown wonderfully in the Lincoln Memorial University." Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, for the arousing of the people "to the duties of Christian citizenship," and for "a healthier public conscience." Rev. Edward O. Guerrant, of Wilmore, Ky., for the progress of our Republic in the march of Christian achievement. Governor A. J. Montague, of Virginia, for the better understanding of the evils of "graft." President Webster Merrifield, University of North Dakota, for the recent developments which show "that the American people are essentially honest at bottom, and that they are still capable of righteous indignation when they become assured of gross abuses of public trust on the part of their chosen servants." Mr. Edward Moseley, Secretary Interstate Commission, for the movement to give equal treatment to all in the commerce of the country. Mr. Albert Kelsey, Philadelphia, for the humanitarian impulses of the age and for improved plans for our great municipalities, making them safer and healthier places to live in. Rev. R. S. MacArthur, New York, for a bright outlook for great revivals all over the land. Sculptor F. Edwin Elwell, for "a strong, honest President and a liberal form of government." Walter S. Logan, New York, for the fact that great reforms are making substantial progress and that the conscience of the people is more sensitive than ever before. Hon. John DeWitt Warner, for the exposures of political corruption and "graft," and for the growing appreciation of the worthlessness of wealth that has not been honorably acquired. Hon. Asa Bird Gardiner, New York, for the fact that the nation is progressing ever toward what is better.

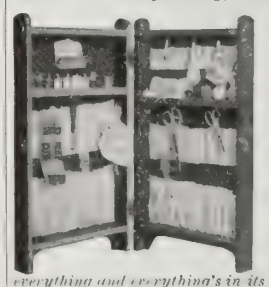
HER MAJESTY'S SEWING CABINET

THERE isn't a wife or mother or sister or sweetheart in all the broad land who wouldn't be pleased with Her Majesty's Sewing Cabinet at any time, and it is especially

For Her Majesty The American Woman

Appropriate as a Christmas Gift.

Every woman with a trace of domesticity in her veins has always wanted it. She hasn't said so, maybe, for she didn't know there was such a thing; but whenever she has sat down for the afternoon with sewing or fancy-work in hand, she has felt its need. Jumping up now for scissors, then for another needle, next for thread, and all those countless other things that she uses in her work! It's exasperating, wearying, discouraging.



Her Majesty's Sewing Cabinet a graceful piece of furniture, novel and convenient, and in the very height of fashion, standing open by her chair, will give her everything she needs, or may need, right at her command. No searching for the misplaced this or that, no delving through jumbled work-baskets. In Her Majesty's Sewing Cabinet there's a place for everything and everything's in its place. Roomy pockets of beautifully figured French cretonne; a leather case filled with Thomas Harper gold-eye needles for all purposes and containing some very rare sizes; assorted threads, large and small scissors, complete pin-book, pin-cushion, tracing wheel, assorted binding tape, darner, measure, genuine beeswax, emery needle sharpener, button bag, and so on! And room for more according to Her Majesty's fancy.

Her Majesty's Sewing Cabinet is 32 inches high, 18 inches wide when closed, and 5½ inches deep. Its total width, opened, is 36 inches.

Our Leader, No. 1, the Cabinet shown in the accompanying photograph, is substantially built along very graceful lines, with Flemish oak, dull finish, the backs being of best quality green art-craft canvas. It opens on gunmetal hinges and is locked with a solid brass Corbin catch. Sold only direct from our shop. Special Price on No. 1 until Jan. 1, $9.50

Our No. 2 Cabinet, same dimensions as No. 1, is finished in pure white enamel, backed with light blue art-craft canvas, or is made entirely of highly finished white enameled wood if so ordered, and has nickeled hinges and catch. Sold only direct from our shop. $12.50.

Our No. 3 Cabinet has a rich, velvety mahogany finish, backed with golden-brown art-craft canvas, or is made entirely of highly mahogany finished wood if so ordered, gunmetal hinges and brass catch. Sold only direct from our shop. $12.50.

These Cabinets shipped direct from our shop to any address, safely crated and Express Charges Prepaid, on receipt of price. If not exactly as represented, return to us and your money will be cheerfully refunded.

We also make to order Her Majesty's Sewing Cabinet in any desired finish or fittings, to harmonize with the decorations of the sewing-room or the tastes of the recipient. Prices named on request.

Delivery before Christmas Day will be possible on all orders received before December 18. Don't put this off. We stand behind all our assertions and descriptions, and the little silver name-plate bearing the title, "Her Majesty's Sewing Cabinet," is a guarantee of quality.

Buy It For HER—Now! Send us your order at once. The Cabinet will be forwarded in strict accordance with your instructions, and it will make Her glad on Christmas Day and on countless days to come.

"Happy, Hopeful, Busy Days"

By Rev. A. C. Dixon, Boston

For all the past
With stars o'ercast
Thy name, O God, I praise;
For promised joy,
Without alloy,
Through all these Hopeful days.

For all I've gained,
By grace obtained,
Thy name, O God, I praise;
For pleasant hours,
'Mid blooming flowers,
Through all these Happy days.

For doing good
To whom I could,
Thy name, O God, I praise;
For doing right,
In Jesus sight,
Through all these Busy days.

For all I've lost,
What'er the cost,
Thy name, O God, I praise;
For sorrow's night,
Stars out of sight,
Through all these Gloomy days.

Because all grief
Shall find relief
Through thy abounding love;
And every cross
That comes with loss
Predicts a crown above.

A VETERAN AT REST

Bishop Stephen M. Merrill's Sudden Death

ACTIVE and busy to the last, the gallant veteran in many a hard struggle for the advancement of the Master's cause, has passed peacefully away. Dr. Stephen M. Merrill had passed the eightieth milestone on life's highway, but had lost none of his faith or of his enthusiasm in Christ's glorious service. On November 11 he had presided at a meeting of the General Missionary Committee of the denomination, and on the following morning preached an eloquent sermon in a Brooklyn church. Later in the day, while visiting a relative, he was seized with alarming illness and in a short time closed his eyes on the world forever. It was a death that any faithful servant of Christ might envy. Freed from the long suffering of a lingering illness, his last public words a testimony to the Master he had served so long and so well, he passed from labor to reward.

The Late Stephen M. Merrill

It is now nearly sixty years since, as a young man of twenty-one he was ordained in the Methodist Episcopal ministry. That he should choose that career had been the hope and prayer of his pious mother, and in their quiet Ohio home she had taught and labored with her boy to lead him to Christ. He reached the age of sixteen and had entered into business life before her prayers were answered. Then, without any definite outside influence, his mother's teaching came to sudden fruition, and in humble reverence he gave himself to Christ. His was not a nature to render any barren profession. He began Christian work immediately and so successful was he, that the pulpit was clearly indicated as his life work. He was received into the Ohio Conference and soon made his mark in the ministry. Twenty-six years later, when his church elected him to the episcopate, its choice was unanimously approved. He served faithfully in that office until last year, when, at his own request, he was relieved of the responsibility. Full of years and of honors, he has gone to his grave as "a shock of corn cometh in its season."

Its Centennial Celebration

The Bedford Street Methodist Episcopal Church of New York City, held its one hundredth anniversary exercises beginning on Sunday, Nov. 19, 1905. Services were held in the church every day for a week, including many interesting features. The church is now in charge of the Rev. Geo. A. MacDonald. Many changes have taken place in the neighborhood since the church was built. The descendants of many of the old families, who made up its congregation, have long since moved uptown; but the old-time zeal, for which Bedford Street Church has always been renowned, still remains,, and the beacon-light shines as brightly for the alien man and brother, as it did in former years for the Greenwich villagers, who filled the old church every Sabbath.

Answered Prayers

Mother and Daughter, Massachusetts. "We know that our Heavenly Father answers prayer. We have asked for help that no earthly friend could give, and we are still trusting him."

Mrs. J. H. J., North Carolina. "I prayed God to lift a cloud from off our home. He did so in a wonderful way. I praise his holy name."

Mrs. L. I., Illinois. "I wish to express my gratitude to God for the safe return of my dear son from a long and dangerous journey. I know and feel that God heard and answered my prayers in his behalf."

Mrs. A. L. R. "I desire to tell others I fully believe in prayer, but we must have faith in Jesus. He has answered my prayers many times, and especially in sickness has he been merciful to us."

Subscriber, Atlanta. "I want to publicly thank God for having delivered us from great trouble."

M. I. S., Colorado. "I wish to acknowledge God's mercy in sparing the life of a very dear one, also for the countless petitions which he has so wisely granted."

Pennsylvania Christian. "My conceptions of the Heavenly Father have been received through a kind earthly one, who will not grant anything detrimental to his children. I feel God has answered my prayer through a denial, and I now see that he knew best. I will trust where I cannot trace."

C. D., Pennsylvania. "For the many prayers God has answered, and one special one, I wish to acknowledge his kindness in the 'Answered Prayers.' I know he answers all prayers that are best for us, or else shows us we are in the wrong."

Mrs. J. K., Indiana. "I have an invalid child, ten years old, who had never spoken a word. I carried the trouble to my Heavenly Father daily in prayer, till he heard me. She now talks to her father and mother. I know this was in answer to my prayer."

Shif'less Jim

KNEW a feller queer as sin,
Awkward like and kinder thin,
Doin' things forever wrong
When he walked jest shuffled 'long.
That's him,
Shif'less Jim.

Farmin' things out in the sun,
Farmin' work wuz never done;
Went about most slovenly,
Didn't care much, you cud see.
That's him,
Shif'less Jim.

Once—it giv' us all the shocks
When we found the dred smallpox
Ketched old Barnes, the bachelor—
No one would go near his door
'Cept Jim,
Shif'less Jim.

Didn't know no one wuz there
Givin' Barnes the best uv care,
Till he got all cured and well,
And we heard the old chap tell,
Withers vim,
'Bout shif'less Jim.

"Think he's shif'less?" sez he, "hey!
Think you're all uv finer clay?
Kickin' 'bout the way he goes,
'Bout his work and 'bout his clothes,
Callin' him
Shif'less Jim!

"But I reckon when ye stand
On the edge of judgment land,
And the Lord selects his best,
He'll say never mind he rest,
But get him,
Shif'less Jim."

Elbert Ansel's Late Thanksgiving

to be more respectful when she's talking to me, I would be obliged. She is very uncouth, very uncouth indeed. None of the other children ever spoke to me as she does."

Mrs. Ansel was silent. In the course of thirty years, spent with a crabbed husband, she had learned that silence is golden.

Away back in the days of their youth, Elbert Ansel had been a sufficiently devoted lover. That he was "near," and grudged parting with money, she soon ascertained; but this one defect apart, he was a faithful husband, a conscientious man, and a useful deacon in the church. The farm was not wholly clear at first; they saved to pay for it, then Elbert coveted more land, and it was bought. He did not withhold money when it was needed to buy stock, or farm implements, or to build barns and outhouses. But for the clothing of wife and children, for extras of any kind, for what he considered superfluities, no money was forthcoming. Mrs. Ansel soon found that her friends received a very cold welcome. Company caused extra expense. The children went to an uncle's or an aunt's for Thanksgiving, by their mother's management.

The elder girl, Marion, married early and happily, and went a few miles away to live in her own home. That house became her mother's refuge, and a place where Julia could meet her friends, as she bloomed into youthful womanhood.

On the evening of our story, Elbert went to bed. His wife and daughter sat up late. Elbert Ansel was aware of nothing different from the ordinary routine the rest of the week. He was called to the court-house on business, a drive of several miles, and, to his own disgust, was soon summoned to serve on a jury.

Mrs. Ansel calmly went on with her work, cooking a great store of pies which she laid away on the buttery shelves, making generous brown loaves, and boiling a ham. It was an obvious provisioning for an emergency.

When Marion heard her mother's decision to go away, she gasped; then sat down and laughed until she cried. Finally, she said, earnestly: "Oh, if you only, only had done it sooner."

"I never could have done it sooner, dear. Never, until this fall, when your uncle in Colorado sent me a letter with a hundred-dollar bill in it, about which I have kept my own counsel, have I had money enough that I could get at to do any little independent thing with. I am sure I am doing right. Only, Marion, keep watch, and if your father is ill, let me know. We may have to stay all winter."

Mr. Ansel's jury duty ended one cold afternoon late in November. He drove into his barnyard, about dusk, unharnessed, and went into the house. The lamp was lighted on the table. Supper was set for one. Beside his plate lay a note from his wife, saying briefly, "Julia and I have gone to New York, to spend Thanksgiving with my sister Bertha. I have left everything very comfortable for you. Be sure to put on your thickest flannels the first cold spell. Alice Pearsall will do your washing. We have decided to stay until you come for us."

The clock had never ticked so loudly. The house was as silent as the grave. But the obstinate old man set his jaw with a grimness like death.

"Stay till I go after ye, hey?" he said to himself. "Then ye'll stay some time."

At Sister Bertha's, Mary Ansel entered a world from which she had been so long excluded that she had almost forgotten its passwords. Her boys came tearing up to see her; two brought their wives; her old friends clustered about her, and she was carried about to the big shops, with their bewildering variety of beautiful things; to museums, and picture-galleries, and parks, and every day was a gala day. She bought a new gown, and had it prettily made, and a new bonnet that took ten years off her face.

It would have given her a turn if she could have peeped into her home, and seen Elbert's housekeeping. The shining neatness was gone. The old man did not shave. He and the house looked unkempt together.

"If she don't want to come home, she may stay where she is," he said stubbornly, over and over in the silent house. "If Julia had not acted so hatefully, her mother wouldn't have thought of going away on a fool's errand." Seeing Julia's photograph smiling at him from her mother's bureau, he thrust it resentfully into the bottom drawer. He even seized his wife's picture with the same intention, but, on second thoughts, he put it back.

Somehow the little picture of his wife began to appeal to him. He had not shaved in a week, but on Sunday, when he did, Mary's eyes kept gazing at him, Mary's mouth smiled.

Thanksgiving was very near now.

A sleigh jingled merrily past one morning, then stopping, turned. It was Marion, who ran in, saying:

"I thought you'd like to know, Daddy, that mother's having the time of her life. Aunt Bert writes that she looks perfectly fine. They are all well."

"Humph," said old Ansel.

"I brought you some bread," said Marion, laying down a loaf.

He walked down the village street that day, and it seemed to him that everybody looked at him askance. At last Cy Hilton, the storekeeper, a man Elbert Ansel much disliked, remarked casually:

"Heard tell your wife had left you. Be she getting a divorce?"

Ansel stalked out of the store without ceremony. But he had not stepped into his sleigh when Lawyer Ames, a foxy little man, put out a limp hand.

"Ansel, if you need my assistance, come to me. Mrs. Ansel's not coming back, they say."

The minister passed him, bowing stiffly. Ansel got into his sleigh and drove home.

But very early next morning, a passenger, muffled up to the eyes, stepped into the city-going train. And late next afternoon a man, gray, grim, embarrassed, but on the whole penitent, rang the door-bell of a house on an uptown street.

Light seemed to flow out from the open door in a great golden flood. The house was full of children, darting hither and thither with joyous shouts. They were playing merry games in the far end of a brilliant drawing-room. Julia, in a white gown, was flitting to and fro. Seated in a low chair by an open fire, with a baby in her arms, was Mary, her face so radiant, her eyes so calm that the old man stood tongue-tied and amazed on the threshold. Mary and this baby! Was it a grandchild, Jim's or Jack's son, maybe? The old man had so forgotten his flesh and blood in his absorbing passion that he had not cared whether or not the boys were married. But this child looked as little Jim used to, and Mary had once held her own babies in that same close way—the mother-way.

The man suddenly felt old and cold and desolate. The tidy maid stared at him, bewildered. Was this some lunatic?

"Whom did you say, sir?" she asked. But just then some impulse made Mary Ansel turn. She gave Jim's boy to his mother. She ran to her old husband and put both arms around his neck. "Come in, dear," she said. "Dinner's over, but you shall have some. We are all here. Bertha, Julia, come quick! Here is Elbert, and our Thanksgiving is now complete."

Beggar Children of Nan King, China

The Child-Waifs of China

I NOTICE that friendly mention is made of my work, in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of August 30. I have been engaged in mission work here since 1892. We have, in Nan King, two chapels, several outstations, and three day schools, with an attendance of sixty boys and twenty girls. These are the children of very poor parents. We also have a girls' orphanage and school. In this building we have twenty girls whom we have rescued and are training for Christ. These girls are taught sewing and different kinds of useful work. We have rescued seventeen boys, some of whom we found in almost deplorable condition—one or two being covered with sores.

This work was begun after we had witnessed several dogs devouring the body of a little girl who had been thrown out. While we have not been able to do much, by the precious lives we have been enabled to save, have proved a splendid investment. It costs two dollars a month to support and educate an orphan. We have three orphan boys studying for the ministry—bright, intelligent, and trustworthy boys—who, we hope, will some day be a power for good. Others are learning trades, and we trust they will make honest, upright men. At present we need a boys' orphanage.

We are using Chinese buildings for our boys. These buildings are very inconvenient and unsanitary. We need proper buildings to carry on this work, if it is to be the success it ought to be.

Nan King, the old capital of China, is almost an ideal place for such a work, and the need of such a work is everywhere apparent. The photographs of two children, enclosed, are types of the little ones we are trying to save. Almost daily we could gather in children who are destitute of the very necessities of life, and who have no homes and no one to care for them. Their condition is surely pitiable.

The Y. M. C. A. in the Army

ON the south side of Governor's Island, New York, the United States Government is reclaiming, at great expense, over one hundred acres of submerged land. Until now this land has been only useless but a menace to shipping. In a few years, it may be covered with military buildings and a garrison of one thousand men.

The Army Branch of the Young Men's Christian Association of New York is doing an analogous work. It is trying to redeem the wasted, and often worse than wasted time, and the squandered energies of the young men composing our army. The records of the last twelve months show that there have been at the four departments of this Branch 123,017 visits, twenty per cent. more than any previous year. Over fifty per cent. of this garrison on Governor's Island every day visits the building. During the year 5543 books have been drawn from the libraries. Classes in mathematics, telegraphy, gunnery, etc., have attracted about one hundred men, and some have been promoted through this work. The "social evenings" have seen many hours profitably spent. Thirty free entertainments have been devoted to lectures, music and literature, which have been largely atended. The Fort Wadsworth Gymnasium, which was the gift of Mrs. William E. Dodge and Miss Dodge, have been most profitably used by the young men of the garrison.

Along the lines of Christian character the Y. M. C. A. Army Branch has specially sought to redeem the time of soldiers. Through four garrison meetings each week, the Branch has helped to encourage the faith and strengthen the purpose of the men and to popularize the study of the Bible. The Bible Study Club at Fort Wadsworth at twenty-one sessions had an average attendance of fifty soldiers.

To carry on a work of this character at four different centres requires a good deal of money—this year $5,600. Of this amount five per cent. is contributed by the soldiers themselves, in the form of memberships, and ninety per cent. must come from friends of the soldiers. Secretary George A. Sanford writes:

"We need the prayers of all. I was present one evening with a soldier from this Harbor at a church service when an appeal was made for some good cause. I saw this artilleryman put one-half of his month's pay, without hesitation, in the collection basket. If we only knew some such spirit of sacrifice as this soldier showed, how all benevolences would flourish, how this Branch could add needed attractions which would be used to splendid advantage! Fifteen dollars will pay the expenses of the entire Army Branch for one day, bringing recreation and encouragement to four or five hundred soldiers.

"The practical question which may arise is: 'Does this work endure? Is it permanent? A few years ago, there was stationed on this island a soldier who came from Maryland, and who afterward told me his story. He said, 'I soon found myself drawn between two influences, on one hand the Bowery, with its temptations, and on the other this Branch, with its attractions. I felt that I would have to settle the matter one way or the other, so over it I spent a whole night in prayer.' That young soldier entered upon a new life, which was exemplary during the rest of his enlistment. Three years have passed and a few weeks ago a letter from the State Secretary of Maryland informed me that this same man had sent to him a petition of over one hundred names from his home, and the promise of a banker of that town, to support a Young Men's Christian Association, if such should be organized there. A soldier from another fort in this Harbor, who had been nicknamed 'Brimstone,' was led into a different view of things, and the man who had been the most profane, became the representative of the Soldiers' Bible and Prayer League."

Avoid colds in winter

You are not hot one minute and cold the next, when using Fels-Naptha soap as it ought to be used. You don't catch cold on wash-days.

As Fels-Naptha searches out and loosens dirt and grime without hot water, without boiling or scalding the clothes, no suds-steam can rise, no bad air is produced; therefore no unhealthy germs are created.

No steaming clothes to stand over, no dipping hands first in hot water, then in cold, no wash-boiler to handle, no lifting clothes in and out.

What all this means to comfort and health you cannot fully realize until you use Fels-Naptha according to the simple directions on each wrapper. Remember that Fels-Naptha is unlike any other soap and must be used differently, to get the best results.

Apart from avoiding bad colds there is the further advantage of having clothes absolutely clean, bleached, and purified at less cost of time, labor and money.

With less work because Fels-Naptha does most of it; in less time because no old ways of boiling and scalding to go through; less expense because helps like washing compounds, soap powder and fluids are not needed, nor any extra fuel.

Get it from your grocer, or we will send you free sample. Follow easy directions on wrapper.

A THREEFOLD CORD

The Story of a Trio of Twentieth Century Girls

BY AGNES DUNCAN

CHAPTER VII.

THE FIRST WEDDING IN THE FAMILY

CROWDING all sail and hurrying preparations for Priscilla's wedding, threw everything else into abeyance, and on the very eve of the marriage day an unforeseen calamity, or rather two of those disastrous events against which no foresight can defend us in this mortal sphere, obliged a change of plans.

The bride-to-be had made up her mind to be married in white, and she decided on a simple organdie. As every girl knows, the simplicity of a fabric does not prevent its being much elaborated in the making. By the time Priscilla's sheer white organdie had been transmuted into a wedding gown, it was a fairy-like marvel of insertions, embroideries and tucks—no less than three hundred of the latter dainty pleatings adorning it. Priscilla's flower-like loveliness would be well set off by the beauty of her gown.

The ceremony over, she and Arthur were to start within an hour on the first stage of their long journey. There would be time only for hurried congratulations from relatives and the changing of their toilettes.

As brides and grooms so often do, they asked the clergyman to come in the night before, and the eventful ceremony was in part rehearsed. The house was decorated with flowers, and several of Priscilla's girl friends dropped in informally. These friends had given her what is called a linen shower, and a curiously carved oak chest containing every article in linen that a bride can possibly wish for, stood in the wide hall. Another chest filled with silver, much of it sent by the friends of Arthur Field, was also in the hall.

In Edgewood it was not customary to lock and bar the doors with any great care, for thieves were rare, and the family had had no end of fun over the reiterated injunctions to keep their silver and valuables under lock and key, that had been sent home by the little mother from abroad. Nevertheless, Arthur and Priscilla had arranged to have their wedding presents in a Safe Deposit Company, and an expressman was to call for them the next morning.

While they were deeply absorbed in rehearsing for to-morrow, with every one in the house, the friends who lodged there, the good Norah, and all looking on, somebody stealthily slipped in at the front door, and lo! the wedding linen and the wedding silver were gone. No single thief could have managed to carry off the heavy chests. There must have been two. Later, it was remembered that there had been the sound of a four-wheeler at the door, but as the Chester girls and the minister, respectively, had come in carriages, nothing was thought of this.

Priscilla sat down and cried till her eyes were red.

"What a terrible omen!" she sobbed. Arthur had much to do to keep from joining her, but he comforted her with promises of detectives and a diligent search.

"The silver will be melted before it can be traced," she sighed, "and I shall never care for the linen after thieves have desecrated it."

"No matter, sweetheart; we'll not let losses vex us on our wedding eve," insisted Arthur. "Nothing has happened to us, and that's the main thing!"

"Gracious goodness!" exclaimed Peggy. "What if they've stolen your wedding gown?"

This dreadful thought sent the whole party flying in frantic haste to the top of the house. The wedding gown in its white splendor lay untouched. No profane foot had crossed Priscilla's threshold.

As if this loss of wedding gifts were not sufficient, when they awoke the next morning little Marjory Marshall was very ill. Her hands and feet were like ice; her head throbbed fearfully; her throat was very sore. The doctor was sent for and the verdict that he pronounced brought consternation to the house; the child had premonitions of scarlet fever.

"It will never do to have company here," was Priscilla's first dismayed thought, and the physician confirmed her impression. Although there was no absolute certainty in his mind, every indication pointed to the malignant malady, and he considered it probable that the home would have to be quarantined. So, hurriedly, word not to come was sent to the few friends who had been expected, Marjory's little maid-of-honor frock, all frills and puffs, was folded up and laid away, and only the immediate members of each family, the Fields and the Harmons, were allowed to be present at the quiet ceremony.

Fortunately, a very dear friend of Anne's, a trained nurse, lived in the neighborhood, and was not then on a case. She came at once, isolated the patient from the rest of the family, and took entire charge. She made arrangements to have everything for the sick-room raised to and lowered from a window, and with her calm, capable manner and tranquil composure, greatly encouraged both Peggy and also Anne, who was now compelled to stay away from the Guthrie's altogether. The sisters were alone after Priscilla had gone, the girl-lodgers temporarily taking flight in a body.

Priscilla and Arthur, notwithstanding the untoward circumstances that attended their wedding, went off very cheerfully. Arthur declined to view Marjory's illness as more than a very great inconvenience and a present distress. He buoyed the rest up with his hopefulness. The bride and groom set off with smiling looks, though their wedding gifts had been stolen and an untimely illness, another thief in the night, had crept through the door. They were young, they loved one another, they were going to the other side of the globe, and it would take more than passing anxieties to weigh them down.

"You will keep us informed about Marjory by wire, won't you?" said Priscilla. "If she has scarlet fever, you'll not be able to send letters."

"If I send letters they shall be disinfected first," Peggy promised. "We'll take no risks. I only fear that so soon as Cousin Tom hears of Marjory's illness, they will all hasten back."

She heaved a rather forlorn sigh. That would be the worst disaster of all.

But Cousin Tom and his family had by this time left Washington for the Southwest, and when Marjory's mother heard of her daughter's illness, she was relieved rather than worried. Three weeks passed before they heard from her.

"The boys have had it," she wrote, "and it is as well that Marjory should have it too. I'm no nurse. She'll have far better care in your house, Cousin Peggy. You can't kill a Marshall easily. She'll come through it all right. Tom and I never fret over the children's illnesses. What's the use?"

"Heartless thing!" exclaimed Peggy.

"No," said Anne, "only lazy, self-centered and irresponsible."

"Heartless sums it up in a single word. Your explanation is only a definition, Anne. But, thank God, the dear child is better, and the crisis is past. She will live, and so soon as she is well enough, we'll take her to Cousin Lavina and the farm."

CHAPTER VIII.—HOME AT LAST

MARJORY blossomed into health and beauty under Cousin Lavina's motherly care. The old farm, a big windy place of pastures and meadows, was an enchanted spot, not to the child only, but to Peggy and Anne, who, having cleaned and fumigated the house, and paid the nurse and doctor, felt themselves entitled to a holiday. Letters from Priscilla were like the chime of silver bells for pure happiness, and the wayfaring father and mother were soon to turn their faces homeward. Cousin Lavina, with keen satisfaction, heard that the two girls had concluded t their mother must find the home as had left it, and that no more strang- were to be admitted. Norah, away a vacation, would be ready to relieve s. Harmon as of old, and the little ly of the house would resume her place the head of the table, as if nothing l happened while she was gone.

'Cousin Lavina, we girls have kept out debt, but we haven't made a penny. have worked faithfully, too, but ngs have been against us.

'I had to spend more on my dress ven at Mrs. Guthrie's than I should ve spent at home," apologized Anne.

'But Anne, you paid the trained nurse; ur weeks, at twenty-five dollars a ek, that made a hole in your savings."

'Miss Antrim offered to accept half- y, but I couldn't take advantage of generosity."

'No, you could not," said Cousin La- a. Her New England independence rned being under an obligation.

'Peggy paid the doctor's bill," Anne nt on, "but it isn't Marjory's illness t handicapped us. Would you believe Cousin Lavina, we've got to paper d paint, and buy a new rug for the ing-room, and a new stair-carpet, and ve a lot of little things done over, all cause we've had boarders and lodgers."

"Indeed, I'm not surprised girls," said vina Pease. "The Marshall boys and ir father and their reckless mother, jured your house furnishings in one nth, more than you, by yourselves, uld have harmed them in a year. Now lep still, both of you. I was with you winter, and I had a beautiful time. n going to help you out. I'll buy the w rug for your dining-room, or for ur mother's room, just as you say. No, ggy and Anne, you needn't oppose me. hy on earth am I always opposed when wish to do a sensible thing? I shall y your mother's rug, and that's all ere is about it."

That was settled. Cousin Lavina could ford it, and the girls understood that e gift would add to her enjoyment.

"What about the tea-room?" asked iss Lavina. "That, I fancy, must be ven up, and you, Peggy, will marry 'alter, and Anne will just stay at home."

"Well, Cousin Lavina, I hope I'll be a od daughter, and if Peggy wishes it, trust she'll be married. I'm not going be idle though. Since I've discovered at the money one earns is more one's vn than the money one's father gives r, I've made up my mind to continue business. Peggy feels so too. We 're laying our plans now to be business artners. We think of starting a lunch id tea-room."

Cousin Lavina was knitting a sweater. he intended it for Marjory's birthday, hich was still a long way off. As the ork was rather intricate and needed her ndivided attention, she deliberately rapped it in a clean white towel, kept or the purpose, and laid it away. Then he folded her hands and looked steadily nto the faces of the two eager girls.

"That sounds very attractive," she id. "Tell me just what you propose o do, and how you expect to get cus- omers?"

"We expect," said Anne, "to begin in small way, but if we are successful in roviding what people want, the enter- rise will grow. Over Winwood's store, n the main street of Edgewood, there is n unoccupied floor. It contains a large, ell-lighted room, and there are two maller rooms which may be utilized by s as a kitchen and pantry. Mr. Guth- ie owns the building. He is willing to ent these rooms to me. I have con- ulted him about our venture, and he hinks it so feasible that he is willing to ake a little stock in it, to the extent of uying our first ten club tickets. My dea is to charge five dollars a year for he privilege of joining the lunch club. Members of the club will then have the ight to come every day for their lunch nd to drop in every afternoon, if they ike, for a cup of tea." Just here Miss Lavina interrupted Anne.

"Five dollars in a lump," she said, "sound like a good sum of money; but remember, child, it won't pay for forty or fifty lunches in a year. You're making a mistake there."

"Not at all, Cousin Lavina. Ladies are to pay the annual five dollars as a membership fee. They will pay for their luncheons when they take them, and Peggy and I do not mean to overcharge. We shall serve only a few things, have them of the very best, and ask only enough to insure us against loss, and give us a small percentage of profit. The larger profits will come when we are patronized by the women of Edgewood when they go shopping, by the students in the Conservatory, and when, as I hope we may, we shall become caterers for the evening parties and the summer picnics and the festivities of all sorts, that go on in our town. I am not over sanguine, but in my mind's eye I can see that we are about to meet a felt want."

"I don't want to be a wet blanket, Anne and Peggy," said Cousin Lavina, "but you can't take Norah away from your mother, and who is to do your cooking, and who will wait on your customers?"

"That," said Peggy, "will be easily managed. Providentially, among my friends in our church, there are a mother and two daughters, who will be more than glad of the opening we can give them for self-support. The father of the family died last winter after a long illness. You may recall my often going to visit him. His name was Amos Watts. Mrs. Watts is a good cook and housekeeper, and her two daughters, while they would not be willing to go into service, have not the least objection to assisting me when I am myself entering a business career."

Still Cousin Lavina seemed doubtful. "If you could have a pretty house," she said, "a little off the main street, with a garden in front, and vines running over the porch, it might be called The Priscilla, after your sister, and I think it would soon be the fashion. But a room over Winwood's store does not look to me as if it would tempt anyone, unless she were starving."

"Our customers," Peggy answered, "won't be actually starving, but they will be fairly hungry and ready to do justice to a dainty meal. There is no opposition to be feared at present, for there is not a lunch-room at all like the one we mean to have, within miles of Edgewood. Being in the very midst of the shopping centre, it will save people time, and time is a commodity that busy women prize. We shall make the room a dream of coolness in summer and cozy warmth in winter. The walls shall be neutral-tinted, and we shall rob the home wherever we can without spoiling it, of pictures and engravings, so that the bare aspect will be relieved. We shall have palms and growing plants in the windows, and furnish our table with dainty china and glass and pretty individual tea-sets, so that what with fine white linen and delicate table appointments, our room will suggest hospitality and not shout the restaurant idea at every one who enters."

"You might," said Cousin Lavina, "include a few men in your scheme. They appreciate good eating and are willing to pay for it."

But the girls vetoed this. Peggy, because she knew her father would disapprove of it wholly, and Anne, for the reason that she meant the venture to be feminine all through. There was not a detail which she had neglected, and she was sanguine that there would be no failure in carrying out the plans exactly as they had been devised. All this really meant very much more to Anne than to Peggy. Anne was still heart-whole. The prince who was to carry her away still lingered out of sight, and she was likely not to send any signals forth to attract him. Anne would not be easy to win, though she was well worth courting.

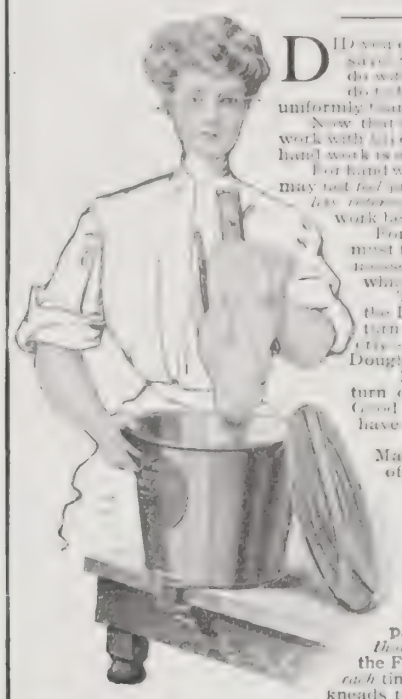
No Hand Can Knead Like This Bread Maker



Did you ever thank [illegible] for Home-baked Bread? It formerly required [illegible] to do with their needles what [illegible] do today. The Kneading Machine [illegible] uniformly [illegible] the most expert [illegible]

Now that [illegible] work with [illegible] many hand [illegible] hand work is [illegible]

For hand work [illegible] on the [illegible] may not feel just right [illegible] has noticed in the work to be done [illegible] work be it all different—like [illegible]

For it is not an easy thing to make [illegible] must fuss with Flour and Water—get your hands [illegible] and then must Bread Dough [illegible] what it's very best [illegible]

Then you're apt to accidentally get Germs into the Dough from your hands and have your Bread turn sour—or [illegible] Or you may not knead sufficient Air into the Dough, and your Bread won't "raise."

Now, how would you like to have your Bread turn out regularly Better than what you could [illegible] Bread, Mrs. Housewife—and not have to work so hard?

Well, you can do it with the Universal Bread Maker; for you see the human element—the element of Chance—does not enter into consideration when you use the Universal to make Bread. All you have to do is to just prepare your liquids (yeast, etc.)—pour them all into the Universal Bread Maker, then sift in the proper amount of Flour, and turn the handle just 3 minutes. At the end of that 3 minutes the Kneading Rod of the Universal Bread Maker—the most wonderful thing about the machine—a part we have protected by patents in every country in the world—will have thoroughly mixed all the liquids (yeast, etc.) in with the Flour—so that each tiny drop of Yeast moistens each tiny particle of Flour. Then the Kneading Rod so kneads the Dough that it folds Air into the Dough—all through it, in fact—better than any mere human hand could do.

And because the Yeast and Flour and Air are so thoroughly mixed together the Dough blows up well—"Raises" well—for you must have the Yeast and Flour and Air combined so as to form the most aerating gas for Dough. And the starch cells will all be broken up and made digestible—for Yeast breaks up the starch cells. Then leave the Dough in the all night to raise—you don't have to take it out and put it into a separate Dough Raiser, as some people have to do. In the morning it will be beautifully risen. Just give a few turns of the handle, so that when you take out the Kneading Rod the Dough clings to it in a sort of ball, just as the picture shows.

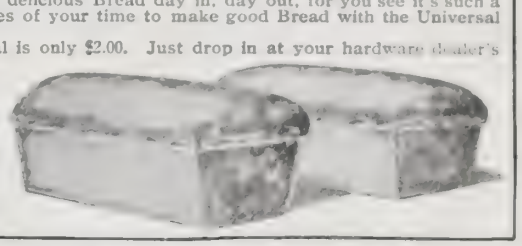
When your Bread is baked it will be absolutely uniform in texture—with a fine brown, flinty crust, and perfectly digestible, since all the starch cells have been broken up by the Yeast. You can have this same delicious Bread day in, day out, for you see it's such a simple thing—only taking 3 minutes of your time to make good Bread with the Universal Bread Maker.

Now, the price of the Universal is only $2.00. Just drop in at your hardware dealer's and see one—he'll probably show you how it works, if you ask him



If you would like to know more about the Universal Bread Maker, and how it always makes perfect Bread in 3 minutes, just drop us a postal and we will send you our free book.

Mrs. Guthrie, who was a born match-maker, had a nephew in Scotland whom she was hoping to have over some summer, especially that he might meet the girl she knew would make him the best of wives. But she had never breathed a word of this even in the ear of her own daughter Janet.

Anne was bent on being in business and making money. Even though the threefold cord should lose two of its strands, she felt quite sure that she could weave a new one for herself with braided threads of integrity, resolution and common sense.

As for Peggy, she would give a year or two, or maybe three, to the lunch-room and tea-room, but it was written in the Book of Fate that she was to marry Walter Prescott, and her dreams were rose-colored with the one romance of her girlish life.

Leaving Marjory with Miss Pease, who more and more looked upon her as on the daughter she might have had, Anne and Peggy returned to Edgewood. They came back to that sort of activity which is best described by the word hustle. They did not let the grass grow under their feet, for the parents were coming home very soon, and it was thought well to get the new business started at least before John Harmon could interpose objections. The little mother might be counted on to agree to whatever the girls wanted, but the father had some old-world notions; among them being a great desire to shield his daughters from the rough winds of the world, and keep them in the sheltered seclusion of their own sweet home. This feeling on his part had originally contributed to his own breakdown. The girls were twentieth century young women, and they must act on their own initiative. Besides, it is always much easier to throw cold water on a project that is in the air, than on one that has materialized. Both sisters were confident that their father would approve of everything when they should be able to escort him into their place of business, and let him see how womanly it all was. They could count also on a strong backing from Mr. Guthrie, and if their ledger could show a clean balance sheet, that would be an additional help.

The flying weeks passed. Busy as they were the girls had never looked so handsome, their faces alight with enthusiasm and purpose, their manner modest yet assured, their whole demeanor that of people who had plenty to do and knew how to do it. Half the ennui and restlessness of our modern girls comes from having too little to do, or from frittering away time on things that amount to nothing.

The happiest days in home life are the days that bring our darlings back after an absence. When, early one morning, the good steamer Albion sailed into port, and Mr. and Mrs. Harmon, looking twenty years younger, rested and refreshed, by travel, rejuvenated as none of their friends had expected to see them, stepped on shore and came home, it seemed as if there was little left to wish for. If only Arthur and Priscilla had been there too, the circle would have been complete. So far from disapproving anything that they heard, the parents were in that state of mind which regards the whole course of events as satisfactory. They had learned the lesson parents are often slow to learn, that their children were grown up, and had a right to live their own lives. Mrs. Harmon settled once more into her place as home-maker, and Mr. Harmon resumed his work at the office. After a few weeks it almost seemed as if they had never been away.

Do thy day's work, my dear,
Though fast and dark the clouds are drifting near,
Though time has little left for hope, and very much for fear.

We can give kindly speech,
And ready helping hand to all and each,
And patience to the young around by smiling silence teach

We can give gentle thought,
And charity by life's long lesson taught,
And wisdom from old faults lived down, by toil and failure wrought.

So do thy day's work still,
The calm, deep founts of love are slow to chill,
And heaven may yet the harvest yield, the work-worn hands to fill.

This was the keynote to which the lives of these good people was set. Such home life flows on amid earthly discords attuned to heavenly melody.

[THE END]

The Look of a Child

"The look of a little child is sometimes a wonderful thing," said a man who had risen high on the ladder of success. "I remember that the greatest lesson I have ever learned in my life was pointed out to me by my daughter, who was only five years old at that time. That was fifteen years ago, when I had just attained some measure of success in the business world, and I felt I could afford to rest on my oars awhile. I had never been a drinking man; but frequent conferences at hotel lobbies and after the theatre, or talks with my associates began to tell on me, and, I am ashamed to confess, that I came home many a night slightly the worse for wear and liquor. The habit grew on me, in spite of tearful entreaties from my wife. I took a bottle of whiskey home one afternoon. After dinner I made for that bottle, which I had left in my study, poured out a glass and raised it to my lips, when I caught a reflection in the polished woodwork of the wall. I turned quickly, and there was my little daughter standing in the doorway looking at me. I could never describe the expression on her face. If one might say it of a child, it was a commingling of reproach, pity and disgust. Probably she had overheard conversations between her mother and myself; perhaps the mother had instilled that feeling; perhaps it was instinct. I have not taken another drink from that day to this."—New Orleans Times-Democrat.

Alone With God

ALONE with God.
Shut is the door.
Though sad and troubled, tempted sore;
How sweet to be
On bended knee,
As out to Him our hearts we pour,
Alone, with God.

Alone with God,
And while we pray,
Our cares take wings and fly away;
As on His breast
We sweetly rest,
Our sorrow's night is turned to day,
Alone with God.

Alone with God,
'Tis heaven below,
His deep, unchanging love to know,
To be shut in,
Away from sin,
Away from sorrow, care or woe,
Alone with God.

Alone with God,
O, hallowed spot,
Where many a lesson has been taught,
And victory won,
Through his dear Son,
In many a battle that was fought
Alone, with God!

Alone, with God,
Whom we adore,
Drawn are the shades and closed the door:
In this retreat,
In service sweet,
We learn to love him, more and more,
Alone, with God.

Alone, with God,
Anew begin,
Go forth, fresh victories to win.
Jesus our King
Whose praise we sing,
Is now enthroned, our hearts within,
Alone, with God.

"The Whole Thing in a Nutshell"

200 Eggs a Year Per Hen

How to get them.

The fifth edition of the book, "200 Eggs a Year Per Hen," is now ready. Revised, enlarged, and in part re-written. 96 pages. Contains among other things the method of feeding by which Mr. S. D. Fox, of Wolfboro, N. H., won the prize of $100 in gold offered by the manufacturers of a well-known condition powder for the best egg record during the winter months. Simple as a, b, c and yet we guarantee it to start hens to laying earlier and to induce them to lay more eggs than any other method under the sun. The book also contains recipe for egg food and tonic used by Mr. Fox, which brought him in one winter day 68 eggs from 72 hens; and for five days in succession from the same flock 64 eggs a day. Mr. E. F. Chamberlain, of Wolfboro, N. H., says: "By following the methods outlined in your book I obtained 1,496 eggs from 91 R. I. Reds in the month of January, 1902." From 14 pullets picked at random out of a farmer's flock the author got 2,999 eggs in one year an average of over 214 eggs apiece. It has been my ambition in writing "200 Eggs a Year Per Hen" to make it the standard book on egg production and profits in poultry. Tells all there is to know, and tells it in a plain, common-sense way. Price, 50 cents, or with a year's subscription, 60 cents; or given as a premium for four yearly subscriptions to the American Poultry Advocate at 25 cents each.

Our Paper is handsomely illustrated, 40 to 80 pages, 25 cents per year. 4 months' trial, 10 cents. SAMPLE FREE. CATALOGUE of poultry books free.

An Ancient Convention

By Mrs. M. Baxter

WHEN Nehemiah directed of God took the census of the restored captives, there were six hundred and forty-two who could not show their father's house, nor their seed, or pedigree, whether they were of Israel (Neh. 7: 61-62). We fear that on the Church roll in many instances, there are those who cannot show their Father's house, and instead of bearing a glad testimony that they have been born again of the Spirit of God, that they have passed from death unto life, by hearing God's Word and believing on him that sent Him (John 5: 24)—that they are new creatures in Christ Jesus, that old things have passed away, and all things have become new—they have nothing better to prove than that they have been baptized with water or have been made externally the members of a church. Such cannot show whether they are of Christ, as these could not show they were of Israel.

The time of the Feast of Tabernacles—about the middle of our October—came round, and "the people gathered themselves together as one man into the street [in Jerusalem], which was before the water gate." The assembled people had one great desire: it was to know more of God, and "they spake unto Ezra to bring the book of the law of Moses, which the Lord had commanded unto Israel." Ezra's vocation was that of a teacher, as Nehemiah's was that of a statesman. "To every man his work," is the order of God. The latter had wrought much in his time as a godly statesman, but his work would soon fall to pieces if the people's hearts were not turned to their Lord, and it was ordered of God that in his reformation Nehemiah should have the co-operation of such a man as Ezra.

The congregation with which Ezra had to deal was composed of "men and women, and all that could hear with understanding." A high wooden pulpit or platform had been prepared for Ezra and the scribes, and the people probably sat (Eastern fashion) upon the ground. And when Ezra unrolled the book, all the people stood up, and Ezra blessed the Lord, the great God. And the hearts of the people were stirred, there was a spontaneous response, "Amen! Amen!" sounded and resounded through the vast company, and "they bowed their heads and worshiped the Lord with their faces to the ground." Ezra was the chief reader, but not the only speaker. There were thirteen others, probably priests and Levites also, who caused the people to understand the law. Whether this was in individual conversation, or whether in catechising them on the truths which had been read, is not clear. In any case, both heart and understanding were reached, as is seen by the result. It is summed up in a few words: "So they read in the book of the law distinctly, and gave the sense, and caused them to understand the reading" (Neh. 8: 1-8).

From the time when the morning dawned, probably about 6 a.m., until midday—at least a six hours' meeting this Bible reading went on. But there is no fatigue when the Holy Spirit is at work; He quickens our mortal bodies (Rom. 8: 11), to do and to endure all to which He calls us. At midday Nehemiah and Ezra, with the Levites, dispersed the people who had been feeding on heavenly manna, to go and dine. "This day is holy unto the Lord your God," they said; "mourn not, nor weep." They had found cause for weeping, as, under the searching light of the Holy Scripture, their sins came to light. But this was a day of grace; the finished walls of the restored holy city were a proof to them that God's favor was towards them, in spite of all their many sins.

They did not understand then what we understand now, that God does not deal with us according to what we are, but according to what he is, "who hath so loved the world that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life" (John 3: 16).

A Pretty Thanksgiving Pulpit

The decoration of pulpits at Thanksgiving time with fruits, vegetables and sheaves of grain is a growing custom in some churches. Rev. Ezra T. Sanford of the North Baptist Church of New York City, has been using this method for many years to impress truth. Our photograph shows his "Harvest Home" decorations in connection with the "Children's Harvest Rally" at the evening hour when the Sunday School held a unique service with Harvest chorals and recitations. In the morning, Rev. Mr. Sanford was assisted by Rev. W. H. Scott, associate pastor of the church. The sermon by Pastor Sanford was timely and appropriate to the surroundings. He used as a text the words of Jesus at Jacob's well: "He that reapeth receiveth wage and gathereth fruit unto life eternal." He told of the harvests of the world and the harvest of souls and urged personal work for deepening the spiritual life.

THE STRIKE AT ROCK CITY

cottages and the store, resulting in a wholesome change. In a day or two, much to the surprise of the miners, their houses were undergoing thorough repairs. Not a word of explanation was given, but as affairs progressed, the miners' attitude began to change. Their hats began to come off when Mr. Abbott passed, a little awkwardly and shamefacedly, it is true, but respectfully, withal, and the groups on the street corners ceased to threaten.

"They do say the old man is agoin' to paint up our shanties," said one, "and my woman is talkin' brave about plantin' posies next year."

"Make sure it's all Miss Agnes' work, bless her!" said another. "I hear tell she's goin' to get us up a Thanksgivin' dinner. Now, if she does that, I'm willin' to go back to work and call it square." As for Mr. Abbott, having begun work on a Christian basis, his heart grew warm, and his interest great. "You see, Clayson," he said to the youthful superintendent, whose objections had taken flight under the influence of Agnes Abbott, "you see, it won't do to give these fellows a real cause for complaint, and the houses were in a bad shape. They'll help the business, to be painted and have little porches in front, and it makes them happy, and they're not much but a parcel of children, anyway. And—ah—um! my daughter has some little plans for them, and ah!—being in the line of missionary work, I could not antagonize her. If a Thanksgiving dinner and—ah—some little thing like that will settle matters, perhaps it is the wisest thing to do."

The Thanksgiving dinner was a gigantic success. Miss Abbott's influence was such that it was quite easy to get other ladies of Rock City to help, and the town hall was beautifully decorated, there was fine music and neat speeches, and a glorious feast! Under its benign influence, the last grudge of the miners was swept away, they became cheerful, gay, and even frisky, and the strike was virtually at an end.

"Papa," said Agnes, late that evening, after their own family reunion dinner had been fully discussed and most of the company had retired, "I have been thinking the matter over, and I believe I will be a home instead of a foreign missionary. I think my work lies right here among these poor miners and their wives and children."

Mr. Abbott drew her closely to his side. "This makes my Thanksgiving complete," he said huskily. "If there was one thing I have felt as if I could not do, it is to give you up to the foreign field. Go to work, my dear; make reading-rooms or whatever you like for those poor creatures—anything, so you stay at home with me."

At the same moment a dark figure was standing at the door of one of the newly-painted cottages and gazing up at the two handsome houses on the hill. "'If it hadn't been for this Thanksgivin',' he murmured, "them houses would be a flamin' up towards the sky to-night. Thank God, they're a standin' there. Thank God for—for everything." And he turned away, this leader of the strike, with a new, sweet feeling of peace in his heart.

A Dakota Church's India Orphan

This letter, from a Western pastor, shows how even small churches in remote districts are interested in the great work of evangelizing India:

I enclose draft for $20.64 from the Welsh Church of Powell, S. D., to support the little ten-year-old girl you mentioned. As I wrote you before, I think either she or a little boy will be supported by said church for four years more, when I can visit them again and tell them more about them.

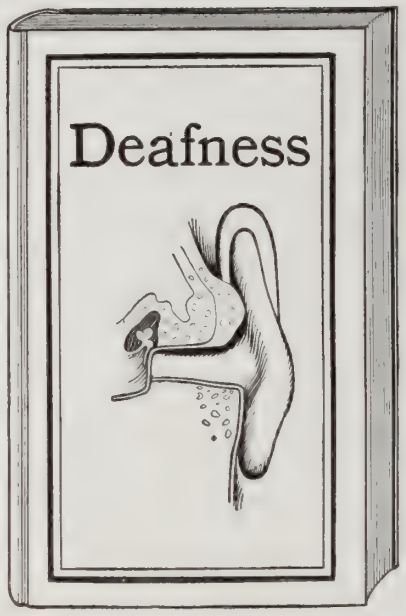
The "EAR=BOOK"

For Deaf People

By George H. Wilson



SUPPOSE you knew a man who had been Deaf for twenty years?

Suppose you met him today, and found he could hear every whisper you spoke to him?

Suppose you enquired about him, and found that he was one of the most reliable, and responsible, citizens of Louisville, whose word could be absolutely trusted.

Wouldn't you want that man to tell you just how he got back his full Hearing after twenty years of Deafness?

Wouldn't you want to know some of the things he found out about the Ear, and about Deafness, in fifteen years study of both, and of his own case?

Mr. Wilson is almost as well known in Louisville as Marshall Field is in Chicago, or John Wanamaker in Philadelphia.

And, he was, for twenty years, almost the Deafest man in his native city.

Any one of the thousands who know him today will certify that his Hearing is now as sharp as their own.

Few men have studied the Ear so earnestly, and thoroughly, as Mr. Wilson had to do, for his own sake.

What he positively knows about Deafness is personal and practical.

It is not mere book knowledge, but the actual facts tested out by his own hard experience.

"The Wilson Ear Book" therefore should be read by every man or woman, who has Ear trouble,—who is Deaf, or threatened with Deafness.

This "Ear Book" will be sent Free to any Doctor, or other person, who will clip out this advertisement and send us, with it, the name and address of one Deaf person in his locality. Address—

The Wilson E. D. Company,
153 Todd Building, Louisville, Ky.

A Unique Washington Charity

THE founder and supporter of the Good Samaritan Home for Friendless Men Washington, is Mr. William Francis owney. "In my experience of ten years providing for more than 4,500 of this nfortunate class," says Mr. Downey, "I nd we can keep them for seventy-five per nt less than it costs to keep them in jails nd workhouses. It is my experience that he gentle touch of the Christly spirit eaches their hearts, wins them, and rarely ails to rekindle the flame of hope in their lasted lives. Supply their temporal needs, nd encourage them to lead honest, indus- ious and frugal lives, and you will make f them good law-abiding citizens, ninety- ne times out of one hundred. The re- ults of this work are wholly due to a lov- g and merciful God who doeth all things ell."

Last November, President Roosevelt ublicly mentioned an incident in the life f Mr. Downey, to illustrate the ideal hristian citizen. The occasion was the ntroduction by the President of Pastor Vagner, the Alsatian author and divine, o a representative Washington audience, he President told the story in his usual irect and forceful manner as follows:

"A few weeks ago, as I was walking ack from church on Sunday, I noticed a reat fire, and found it was Mr. Downey's very stable. My attention was particularly alled to the case, and I looked into it. have long known of the work done with ngular modesty by Mr. Downey, in trying o give homes to the homeless, to be him- elf a friend of those who were, in a pecu- ar sense, friendless in Washington, and y accident I found out what had happened n connection with this particular incident. t appears that last spring, Mr. Downey tarted to build a new livery stable. His table is next door to a colored Baptist Church. Mr. Downey is a white man, and hese neighbors of his are colored, and their tinship is of that broad humanity that hould underlie all our feelings toward one nother. Mr. Downey started to build his table, and naturally wanted to have it as ig as possible and to build right up to the imits of the land. That would bring his vall close up against the side of the colored Baptist Church, cutting off light and air. The colored preacher called upon him, and old him they would like to purchase a trip six feet broad of Mr. Downey's ground, upon which he was intending to build, as it would be of great inconveni- ence to them to lose the light and the air. Mr. Downey concluded he ought to grant the request, and so notified them.

"After a little while, the preacher came around with the trustees of his church and said that they very much appreciated Mr. Downey's courtesy and were sorry that they had bothered him, as they had found, on looking into the affairs of the church, that they were already in debt; they did not feel warranted in incurring any further financial obligations and so they had to withdraw their request. Mr. Downey could not get to sleep that night, until finally he made up his mind that, as they could not buy the strip, he would give it to them anyway, which he did. Mr. Downey's livery stable caught fire and burned down. It was Sunday morning and the Baptist Church was in session next door. The clergyman stopped preaching and said, 'Now you women stay right here and pray and you men go straight out and help our benefactor, Mr. Downey.' And so they did, and got his horses all out. Now," said the President, "I call that a practical application of the text, 'Be ye doers of the Word and not hearers only.' And here in Washington we have a right to be proud of a citizen like Mr. Downey."

Later, Mr. Downey had the area or alley between the church and his new building nicely paved, put up a front fence, erected a terrace wall at the east side of the church, and did not charge the congregation a penny for the improvements.

Mr. Downey's heart is wedded to his work in behalf of fallen humanity. During the blizzard of 1895 he rented a modest two-story building opposite his stables and there opened a Home, which has been a sheltering arms to thousands who otherwise would have been dashed on the rocks of sin, and lost. The home is simply furnished; the men prepare their own food and thus greatly lessen the cost. Every evening he meets the inmates and conducts a simple, religious service, pointing them to the better way and speaking words of encouragement.

At a cost of twenty-five thousand dollars he has lately erected a new building, four stories high, which will soon be dedicated to the Home work now carried on across the street in the more modest building. It will contain club room, library, dormitories, kitchens and laundries, all well appointed and lighted by electricity.

Shall we not write this man down "as one who loves his fellow-men?"

I can guarantee a regular monthly income to your Society of from $15 to $50 the year round.

I am a church man myself and am thoroughly familiar with the financial difficulties under which nearly every church society labors.

I know that practically every expedient under the sun must be resorted to in order to keep the financial head of most societies above water. I know that hereto an efforts must be put forth in most cases every time $5.00 or $50.00 are added to the treasury and that the women folks are worked and worried half to death trying to devise and execute these various schemes.

Now if the members of your society will give me one-half the support they are obliged to give to these money-raising efforts, I will guarantee to provide from $15.00 to $50.00 a month without necessitating any of the work or the worry.

This is a good straight-forward business proposition. There is no canvasing to be done or novelties to be sold; nor is anything required that would in anyway lower the dignity of any organization.

My plan does not depend upon "loyalty to the society" alone. I make it an OBJECT to the members of your society to continue their co-operation. It is money in their pockets to do so.

Unless you are actually married to the ice-cream-social and oyster-supper idea of raising funds, you owe it to both yourself and your society to ask me about my plan. It will only cost you a stamp to find out all about it and it may solve your money-raising problems. The plan is equally adapted to Young People's Societies or to Ladies' Aids and the like.

Cut out and return this coupon to me and I will send you full information and instructions by return mail. Those who send immediately will be able to get their 1st monthly draft Dec 1st.

Fox Lasso Eye-Glasses

Be comfortable. Have eye-sight like you once had — free from annoyance and worry of shaking, breaking glasses.

Fox Lasso eye-glass adjustments make it easy for you to see clearly. They hold the glasses firmly before the eyes, and are comfortable to the nose—don't pinch, yet are steady and secure.

Mr. Ivan Fox invented them after many years of close study and devoted work.

They are glasses to wear all the time—to work, to read, to eat, to do anything. Different from all others. The patent Lasso Guard, the Tubular spring, and Screw Lock Ends to both Guard and Spring put them beyond all comparison with ordinary eye-glasses.

Our "Book L," "Eyes Worth Having," written by Mr. Fox, tells all about them. It is interesting and valuable. Free if you give us the name and address of your optician.

First-class opticians everywhere sell Fox Lasso Eye-glasses. If your optician hasn't them, write us and we'll see that you get them.

The City of God*

HOW much of John's account of his vision of the Celestial City is figure, and how much actual fact, has always been a subject of conjecture. We can easily imagine that the spectacle in its splendor and beauty may have been beyond his power of description. No words could give adequate idea of its grandeur, and he may have fallen back on the emblems of magnificence that were in current use, to express the glory that he could not portray. The streets of pure gold, the jewels so large as to be foundation stones, the gates of one pearl, are doubtless imagery, used as symbols of exquisite grace and radiance. Paul, who claimed to have been caught up into Paradise (II. Cor. 12: 4), tells us nothing of what he saw, and is silent even about what he heard, on the ground that it was not lawful to repeat it. Perhaps it would be difficult, if not impossible, for a mortal to conceive of the wonders of that city. In the charming fable, the grub of the dragon-fly, who, living at the bottom of a pond from which it had never emerged, asked the frog to describe the wonders of the land to which he had been, could not understand the dry land and the life there, is a type of the human race attempting to grasp heavenly conditions. It is a vain effort.

It is only by a succession of negatives, that we can approach a conception of that heavenly condition. The experiences that distress us here, vanish there, and we are relieved by knowing that we shall know no more the pains and sorrows that embitter our earthly life. There is to be no more night with its dangers and embarrassments; no more tears of sorrow for wrong deeds, our own, or those of others; no more partings from loved ones, who leave us here for distant shores or for the unknown land; no more pain, physical, or the far worse, mental; and no more sin, for sin of all kinds is excluded from that happy land. All these banished, what a region of delight and joy it must be. The poor mortal entering there, after a life of poverty, suffering and sorrow, must revel in the freedom from those sources of misery. The positive happiness we may not be able to imagine; but it is something to know, that the enemies that have tortured us in this life can afflict us no more.

What are the functions of that healing tree (Rev. 22: 2), which the apostle saw on either side of the River? Who can tell what are the maladies that are healed by its leaves? He that has eaten of that bread which came down from heaven, and has learned what sustenance he has obtained from it; how it has given him strength to resist temptation, how it has supported him under persecution, under ridicule, under trial and grief, can imagine how his spirit, even there, would crave more of such nourishment. What the tree symbolizes we know not, but that it heals the evils that cling to his being, is a fact that is very encouraging to every one who knows his own nature.

It is a remarkable fact that the Apostle also noticed that there is no temple there (Rev. 21; 22). We have come to associate the idea of heaven with continual worship. How is it then that there is no temple? Does it not imply that the reverent soul enters so completely into the spirit of the Master that the whole life is worship, because it is service. He went about doing good. When Christians do that, the world will believe in Christianity. The trouble with so many is that their religion begins and ends with the church. They never think of carrying their religion into their daily life. "True religion and undefiled is to visit the fatherless and the widow in their affliction and to keep himself unspotted from the world." Men should go to church to worship and to get strength for service. If going to church is the enjoyment of a good sermon, a peaceful rest and a satisfaction of conscience, there is little gained. It is the inspiration, the stimulus that is obtained in the service that is the real benefit. Those who are thought worthy to enter the city of God are continually serving him, busy all the time in ministration. One day is holy as another and every place is a place of service. That is the ideal life, the life Jesus lived and the life his followers live in the city of God.

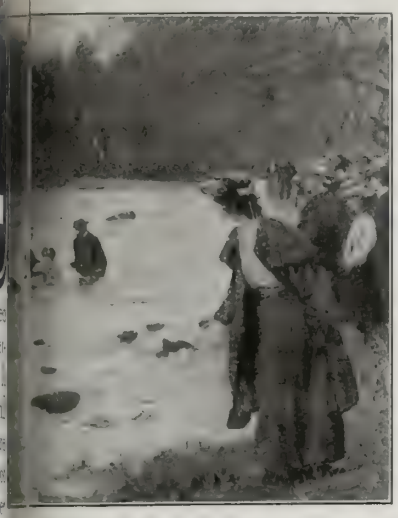
The Great Welsh Revival

THE religious fervor of Wales (says a writer in the London Sphere), which has received a striking demonstration in the recent "revivals," is so tense that even in this wintry weather, converts run the risk of adult baptism in the open. Two young women and two young men were baptized in the Dee, at the little village of



A Baptism in the Frigid Waters of the River Dee

Trevor, near Llangollen, on a recent Sunday. Although the morning was fine, it was obvious that the water felt bitterly cold when the young people entered it; the girls wore light dresses, the men merely throwing off their coats. During the ceremony, the Rev. E. Williams, who officiated, pressed them backwards beneath the water. Large numbers of interested spectators stood on the banks and witnessed the ceremony. No ill effects have ever been known to occur, though on some of these occasions the weather has been so cold that it has been necessary to break the ice.

To Help the Boer Women

COUNTESS EVELYN ASINELLI, of Geneva, Switzerland, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, asking the interest of its readers in behalf of the Boer women and children of the Transvaal and Orange River colony. She says:

"I have tried to arouse sympathy in the hearts of all Christians for this great cause. In March last the home industries (spinning, weaving and knitting by machinery), were started in the Transvaal and in Orange River colony among the women and young girls. The progress has been most encouraging, but misery is such in that poor ruined country, that I feel I must appeal to the compassion and generosity of unknown friends, in order that all the Boer womankind might benefit by the work.

A Diplomat on Missions

In a recent speech, Major Conger, who has served his country as Minister at the Chinese Court, gave the following testimony to the value of Christian missions: "For the last seven years I have been intimately associated with the missionaries of China, a body of men and women, who, measured by the sacrifices they make, the trials they endure, and the risks they take, are veritable heroes. They are invariably the forerunners of Western civilization. It is they, who, armed with the Bible and school books, and sustained by a faith which gives them unflinching courage, have penetrated the darkest interior of the great empire, and blazed the way for the oncoming commerce, which everywhere quickly follows them."

BARRELS OF AIR BURNED AS FUEL

New, Remarkable Heating Stove---Ohioan's Great Invention---Consumes 395 Barrels of Air to One Gallon of Common Kerosene Oil Making Oil-Gas---The New Fuel that Looks and Burns Like Gas!

Wood, Coal and Oil All Cost Money. ONLY FREE FUEL IS AIR! Unlimited Supply No Trust in Control. Air Belongs to the Rich and Poor Alike. We Can't Burn Air Alone, but See Here! Our Wonderful Stove Burns Air and Gas—Very Little Gas—Principally Air. Takes its Fuel Almost Entirely from the Atmosphere.

A Miniature Gas Works—Penny Fuel for Every Family—Save ½ to ⅓ on Cost—Save Dirt and Drudgery. No More Coal or Wood to Carry—Ashes Unknown—Absolute Safety.

SEE HOW SIMPLE! TURN A KNOB---TOUCH A MATCH---FIRE IS ON. TURN AGAIN---FIRE IS OFF! THAT'S ALL.

Astonishing but True—Time-Tested—Proven Facts—Circulars Give Startling Details—Overwhelming Evidence.

NO SUCH STOVE SOLD IN STORES—UNLIKE ANYTHING YOU'VE SEEN OR HEARD OF.

Because air is the only free fuel and no trust in control inventors have tried for years to find a way by which properties could be drawn from the atmosphere and used as fuel for general household purposes, thus producing the cheapest fuel obtainable.

To a Cincinnati genius heretofore unknown to fame must go the credit of solving this great question. Understand, you cannot burn air absolutely alone, but this new air generator actually takes its fuel almost entirely from the atmosphere, so much so as to take in 395 barrels of air while consuming one gallon of oil.

The time has come at last when the readers are no longer compelled to continually drudge with coal and wood fires, for every family who desires can heat, cook and bake with oil and air gas, the wonderful new fuel, which frequently saves from ⅓ to ½ on fuel bills. What a blessing this is to women folks, who for the first time in their lives can say, no more coal or wood, or smoky oil wick stoves to make life miserable with daily drudgery so ruinous to health and looks.

Thousands a Week.

Upon calling at the factory, we find that this invention has caused a remarkable excitement all over the U. S.—that the factory is already rushed with thousands of orders, and the Company's representatives and agents are making big profits, as they offer splendid inducements.

SECTIONAL CUT OF GENERATOR

As will be noticed from the engraving, this oil-gas and air generator is entirely different from any other stove—although its construction is very simple—and durable—last for years—no wick—not even a valve, yet heat is under perfect control—no leaks, nothing to close or clog up.

By simply turning a knob, as you would a door knob, the oil is automatically fed to a small steel burner bowl or open trough, when it is instantly changed into gas, which is drawn upwards between two red-hot perforated steel chimneys, all the while drawing in about one barrel of air to every large spoonful of oil consumed, making quick, intense heat, which passes direct to Radiator on top, and this great volume of heat, thrown off in all directions by eleven Radiator tubes, aided by one large central column with a distributing surface equal to a cylinder 5 feet in circumference.

Every drop of fuel is consumed—goes into heat—making hottest gas fire—nothing wasted—all the heat stays inside and none goes up the chimney, for this stove requires no pipes or flue connections—use it anywhere about the house, office, or store—move it about as often as you like.

This invention has been fully Protected in the U. S. Patent Office, and is known as the Harrison Valveless, Wickless, Automatic Oil Gas & Air Generator, the only one yet discovered that consumes the carbon and by-products of the oil.

The extremely small amount of kerosene oil that is needed to produce so large a volume of gas makes it, we believe, the most economical fuel on earth, and the reason for the great success of this generator is based on the well-known fact of the enormous expansiveness of oil-gas when mixed with common air.

Kerosene oil, from which oil-gas is made, is sold by all grocers—buy as consumed—as you would for a lamp—gallon lots or two—let pennies do the work of dollars and save the difference. At last humanity is blessed with a cheap fuel that makes no dirt, ashes, soot—removing forever the greatest nuisance that women folks ever suffered.

What a pleasure to just turn the knob—touch a match—a beautiful gas flame appears—hottest fire—always ready—on or off at will—self-regulating—no more attention—same heat all day or all night—could anything be more perfect?

It generates the gas only as needed—simple, handsome, durable, easily operated, and another feature is its perfect safety. This stove is so safe that you could drop a match in the oil tank and it would go out.

Combination Heating & Cooking Stove

This oil-gas stove can be instantly changed into a fine cook stove by removing Radiator, when you get the same volume of heat condensed into a small space, and by placing an oven over the burner splendid baking can be done. Many people do away with ordinary cook stoves entirely by using these stoves with Radiator and oven. Same stove without Radiator is invaluable for spring and summer use, so that it is adapted for any time of the year.

While at the factory in Cincinnati, the writer was shown thousands of letters from customers who were using this wonderful oil-gas stove, showing that it is not an experiment, but a positive success and giving splendid satisfaction, and as a few extracts may be interesting to the readers, we reproduce them:

Mr. E. D. Arnold, of Neb., writes: "That he saved $4.25 a month for fuel by using the Harrison Oil Gas Stove; that his gas range cost him $5.50 per month, and the Harrison only $2.25 per month."

J. A. Shafer, of Pa., writes: "The Harrison Oil-Gas Stove makes an intense heat from a small quantity of oil—entirely free from smoke or smell—great improvement over any other oil stove. Has a perfect arrangement for combustion—can scarcely be distinguished from a natural gas fire."

M. W. King, of Va., writes: "By using one Burner and Radiator, I kept 16 x 18 foot room at 70 degrees, when outdoors 15 to 20 degrees were registered."

Mrs. Towner, of Pa., writes: "Harrison Oil-Gas Stove and Radiator so easy to operate that my children attend to it. My husband is an invalid, and I can keep his room (14 feet square) nice and warm with about one quart of oil a day."

Emma Haines, of Ill., writes: "I used the Radiator when the mercury was below Zero, and my room (14 x 15 feet) got warm quite soon. The stove is fine for heating, and is also fine to cook and bake."

Rev. Wm. Tearn, of Me., writes: "This morning the temperature was 16 below zero, and my library far below freezing point. Soon after lighting the Harrison Oil Gas Stove the temperature rose to summer heat."

Wm. Baering, of Ind., writes: "Received 3-burner Stove, Radiator and Oven. Christmas morning we warmed a room 13 x 14 feet when it was 'heat 12 below zero' with one radiator."

W. S. Safford, of Ohio, writes: "I have a room in a brick house, size 12 x 12 ft., which I can heat without any trouble with a Style A, 1-burner."

Agents are doing fine—Making big money.

WONDERFUL QUICK SELLER.

Geo. Robertson, of Me., writes: "Am delighted with Oil-Gas, so are my friends—took 12 orders in 3 days."

A. B. Slimp, of Texas, writes: "I want the agency—in a day and a half took over a dozen orders."

Edward Wilson, of Mo., writes: "The Harrison very satisfactory—sold 3 stoves first day I had mine."

J. H. Halman, of Tenn., writes: "Already have 70 orders."

This is certainly a good chance for the readers to make money.

Hundreds of other prominent people highly indorse and recommend oil-gas fuel, and there certainly seems to be no doubt that it is a wonderful improvement over other stoves.

The writer personally saw the Oil-Gas Stoves in operation—in fact, uses one in his own home—is delighted with its working—and after a thorough investigation can say to the readers that this Harrison Oil-Gas Stove made by the Cincinnati firm is the only perfect burner of its kind.

It is made in three sizes, 1, 2 or 3 generators to a stove. They are made of steel throughout, thoroughly tested before shipping—sent out complete, ready for use as soon as received—nicely finished with nickle trimmings, and as there seems to be nothing about it to wear out, they should last for years. They seem to satisfy and delight every user, and the makers fully guarantee them.

HOW TO GET ONE.

All the lady readers who want to enjoy the pleasure of a gas stove—the cheapest, cleanest and safest fuel—save ⅓ to ½ on fuel bills and do their heating, cooking and baking at small expense, should have one of these remarkable stoves.

Space prevents a more detailed description, but these oil-gas stoves will soon meet the most exacting demand for durability and satisfactory properties.

If you will write to the manufacturers, The World Mfg. Co., 6045 World Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio, and ask for their illustrated pamphlet describing this invention and also [illegible] of delighted users, you will receive much valuable information.

The price of these stoves is remarkably low, only $5.00 up. And as you could not afford to be [illegible] anything else that would insure such saving in fuel bills, so must good health and satisfaction to our wives.

Questions and Answers

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD invites the managers of missionary and charitable enterprises, who feel entitled to recognition when financial apportionments are under consideration, to send full description of their work, together with list of references and such printed matter as may be at their disposal, to "Charity Department," THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City. Communications thus addressed should be STRICTLY CONFINED to the information herein called for.

Mrs. E. P. S., Morristown, N. J. Can you tell me the cause of the Russians redoubling their persecutions of the Jews at the present time? Do you think Mrs. Witte's being a Jewess makes them all the more malignant toward them, inasmuch as the Emperor and Mr. Witte are so friendly since the Peace Conference?

We do not believe that the fact that Mme. Witte is a Jewess has anything to do with the persecution of the Jews in Russia. It is an old trick of the Russian autocracy to set the common people against the Hebrews whenever it is desired to divert the people from attacking the real source of their troubles and sufferings—the autocracy themselves. In the present instance, it has been repeatedly charged that the attacks on the Jews in various places were directly instigated by the authorities, and that the police and military have even pointed out the houses of Hebrews to the rioters.

A. P. Z., Jamaica, L. I. Kindly inform me what is meant by the term "Kentucky Resolutions"?

"Kentucky Resolutions," were a series of nine resolutions, introduced into the Kentucky Legislature in 1798, by George Nicholas, though it was afterward known that Thomas Jefferson was the author of them. They were directed against the Alien and Sedition Laws, and against acts passed to punish frauds on the Bank of the United States, and also emphasized the rights of the several States.

Nora P. S., Cliftondale, Mass. Who was Thomas a Kempis? Where was he born and where did he die?

Thomas a Kempis was born in Kempen, near Cologne, in 1380. Hence he was called, "Thomas from Kempen." His true name was Hamerkin. He was noted for piety, and was a most successful instructor of youth, and was at one time sub-prior of the Monastery St. Agnes. One of the most famous of books, The Imitation of Christ, was written by Kempis. It has been translated into more languages than any other book, excepting the Bible. Kempis died in 1471.

Mrs. M. E. H., Golden, Colo. What is the name of the most beautiful star which we see here generally about seven o'clock in the evening? It is in the East, almost directly under the cluster of seven stars, or what is called the "Little Dipper." I have been wondering if it could be the Star of Bethlehem.

The bright star-like object seen in the East in the early evening is not a star, but the giant planet, Jupiter, now about at his nearest to the earth (about 400,000,000 miles). It would take an express train about 1,000 years to reach him. His diameter is about 88,000 miles, being much larger than all the planets and satellites in the solar system combined, or 1,400 times larger than the earth. It will be twelve years before he will be where he is again, being so near the Pleiades. The question is often asked, "Are the planets inhabited?" While our home is here on earth, this cannot be answered. In Isaiah 45: 18, there is the statement that the earth would have been created in vain if not inhabited. Reasoning from analogy, we might say Jupiter may be inhabited by intelligent beings.

LOUIS SWIFT.

Marathon, N. Y.

Reader, Breezewood Pa. 1. Why is it always smoky during Indian summer, even when there are no fires at the time? 2. Who is the greatest and wisest man living?

1. The so-called Indian summer is not always smoky. The smoky, gray atmosphere so often coming at that time is, as a usual thing, the result of forest fires. The smoke can be carried a great distance. Forest fires in Michigan have, for example, caused a grayness in the atmosphere as far east as New York State, and the western part of New England. In the late fall hardly any of the great forest tracts are free from fires, on account of the great accumulations of dead leaves. 2. There would be as many answers to this question as there are minds. The name mentioned in your letter would be hardly ranked among the foremost.

Flora C. D., Cornwall, N. Y. Who was the "Lynn Bard"? Was he a native of this country, and why was he called a "Bard"?

Alonzo Lewis was a poet who was born in Lynn, Mass., August 29, 1794. He was rather an eccentric character, living in a most picturesque cottage on what is now known as Ocean Avenue in his native city. The house was entirely covered with bark and the gate-posts were made from smooth, round, wave-washed stones, picked up from the adjacent ocean's shore. Mr. Lewis was the author of Forest Flowers and Sea-Shells, which reached ten editions, and a History of Lynn. He died at his home, January 21, 1861.

Ira B., Albany, N. Y. I observe that some critics are attacking Supreme Court Justice Brewer's new book, on The United States, a Christian Nation. Do you consider the title justifiable?

Most assuredly. Ours is a Christian nation in the widest and highest sense. Several years ago, when the Ingersollites made the same assertion Justice Brewer's critics are now making, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD demonstrated the fact beyond all question, that an overwhelming majority of our government, including President, Vice-President, the entire Cabinet, practically all the heads of Departments and Bureaux, ninety per cent. of both Houses of Congress, the staff of our Army and Navy almost as a unit, and almost all of the leading authors, educators, scientists, inventors, and others of both sexes, distinguished in various professions, were Christians, and they did not hesitate to proclaim the fact to the world. The fact that there may be a few agnostics in the land, or that we get, in the course of immigration a sprinkling of aliens who are not Christian, cannot affect the main conclusion.

Inquirer, Englewood, N. J. What is the proposed "Calendar Reform" to be instituted in Russia by Premier Witte? To what extent does the Russian reckoning differ from our own?

There is a difference of thirteen days between the Gregorian and Julian calendars, the former, which Russia uses, being behind the latter to that extent. For a long time, the matter of such a change has been discussed in Russia, in order that the country might conform to the rest of Europe.

H. J., New York. We are quite convinced that a really sincere, earnest Christian man or woman would devote the time to better advantage than dancing, card-playing or theatre-going.

H. Y., West Virginia. What relation was Bushrod Washington, the famous Virginia lawyer, to George Washington?

He was a nephew, and Washington willed to him his papers and library. He died in Philadelphia in 1829.

The unique Question-and-Answer Bible Class, now being conducted at the Bowery Mission by the Rev. Thomas O'Hanlon, D.D. (founder and for twenty-seven years conductor of the famous Ocean Grove Bible Class), meets every Sunday afternoon from two to three o'clock. It is open to all, and any one present is privileged to put a question in the question box, all such being promptly and satisfactorily answered. Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are especially invited to attend these services.

A Royal Thanksgiving Gift

A READER of this journal, who delights in doing benevolent deeds anonymously, and whose munificent gifts to the Lord's work at home and abroad have been announced on several occasions in these pages, has forwarded to the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the sum of $2,400, with the request that it be distributed as a Thanksgiving Gift wherever it is most needed and can be used to the best advantage for God's glory and the cause of humanity. Responding to the wishes of this humble follower of the Master, who, by special request, must remain unnamed, the editors of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD met, and after due consideration of the whole subject, decided upon the following plan of apportionment, and remittances have been mailed accordingly:

Mrs. C. E., Pine City, Minn. We cannot find any record of such an event in Chinese history.

S. H. H. Your contribution for Door of Hope was received. See acknowledgment in our issue of September 26.

Miss E. H., Virginia. Cora, whose portrait appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, can be addressed at the McAuley Mission, 316 Water Street, New York.

Mrs. R. A. H., Oregon, Wis. Consumption is becoming better known and understood. The percentage of cures is now larger than at any previous time.

W. Mountain, Ont., Can. Although cousins frequently marry such unions are not encouraged. The offspring of those so closely related by blood is apt to be degenerate.

Reader, Paterson, N. J. You can procure the Prayers for Public Worship and Private Devotion ($1) from M. E. Munson, publisher, 77 Bible House, New York.

Mrs. G. W. C., St. John, Kan. We never heard of the sect in question. It is a safe rule to cling to the old Gospel and the "old paths," and to leave faddists and fanatics alone.

T. M. P., Easton, Md. Church fairs are apt to be overdone, especially where auctions, raffles and lotteries are introduced. We do not believe in them as a method of raising church funds, and consider them not at all conducive to the spirituality of a congregation.

J. T. D., Cleveland, O. We see no special point or object in your proposed trip around the world. The work you indicate is now being done faithfully and well by men and women specially trained for it. A better field for practical results, under the conditions you describe, would be the home field. Write to Robert Hunter, 88 Grove Street, New York City, and he will advise you on wise and useful lines.

H. Ten, Virginia. Your desire for a cheerful and agreeable home is quite natural. It may, however, be your duty to remain where you are, and use your influence in improving your present surroundings; but if you feel called to make the change, and believe sincerely that it will be an advantage, we can see no reason why you should not do so. There are sometimes obstacles which one cannot overcome except under new conditions.

A Labrador Mission Settlement in Winter

Harpooning Walrus

WINTER JOYS IN THE FROZEN NORTH

How the Eskimo of Labrador Pass the Long, Dreary, Sunless Season

BY CHRISTIAN SCHMITT

SOON after our icebound coast cast off once more its wintry aspect, we were cheered and encouraged again by letters and tokens from friends far away, who had remembered us during the many months in which we were shut out from the outer world. Your kind letters of January 3 and June 26 (with checks for $10 and $50), we received together on August 6, and we thank your kind readers for their generous gifts for our Labrador work.

Last year I wrote you mainly about the beginning of our Mission. I wish now to tell you some features of the life of our people, and the work we are privileged to do here. Agriculture, of course, is out of question here; indeed, if our people ever felt inclined to turn vegetarians, they would soon have to starve. They are a carnivorous race, feeding on land and sea animals, but the greater portion of their food is supplied by the sea. The walrus, the white whale, and especially the seal, furnish them with a food peculiarly adapted to the climate, for the heating quality of this diet enables them to endure the extreme temperature of winter, 40 degrees below zero.

In April, our Eskimos make long journeys into the interior of Labrador to hunt reindeer or cariboo. These journeys they accomplish with their sledges and dogs, often traveling hundreds of miles. During their travels, they frequently meet with Indians, but are not able to have much intercourse with them, as these again speak another language. Sometimes, while hundreds of miles away from any human habitation, the pinch of want is severely felt. Deer may happen to be scarce—other animals or birds are never plentiful in these altitudes—and when reduced to extremes the native will cut up, soak, and chew anything in his possession that is made of skin. Boots, clothes, rugs, all have to be sacrificed to keep man and dogs alive. In most cases, they will eventually meet with deer, but if this is impossible, they have to return home as best they can. During these journeys they carry no tents. They build each night a new snow-house, which does not require more than half-an-hour to construct. As soon as the deer is reached, proper camps of snow-houses are built, and then they will live in these for weeks.

Their hunting-grounds for the polar bear, walrus and seal are not so far from the mission station. Although the coast is ice-bound from the end of November till the end of June, yet some twenty to thirty miles away to the east, outside of all islands and shoals, there is to be found more or less during the whole winter, an expanse of open water, which is usually called "the ice's edge." Here the Eskimo hunts the polar bear, walrus and seal, and here more than anywhere he is called upon to exercise skill and judgment, courage and patience. In former years, the only weapons used were harpoons. Modern rifles are now taking the place of the old hunting implements.

The Mission Band at Nain

The journey to "the ice's edge" is often attended with difficulty and danger. The ice, which is often hummocky, being piled up by the waves of the sea, must be traversed by sledge and dogs. The hunters have always to be on the alert, as an off-shore wind will swiftly disconnect huge "pans" of ice, and drive its occupants far out to sea. Here, also, they encamp, and live for the time in snow-houses. Hunting the seal is not difficult, although it requires good marksmanship, especially from the light "kayaks" (boats), which adapt themselves to every motion of the sea. The polar bear and walrus are more difficult to hunt, on account of the resistance they offer. Nearly every winter some hunter is attacked, upset and turned out of his "kayak" by a wounded walrus. The Eskimo very rarely loses presence of mind in any extremity. He will first clutch and hold fast to his gun or harpoon, and then he will look for a way of escape. As the Eskimo cannot swim, one of his fellow-hunters will go and pull him out of the water when he is upset.

A Nain man went hunting for small game one day, with a muzzle-loading shotgun. After tramping for a whole day without result, he bent his footsteps homeward. On his way, while emerging into a more open expanse of ice, a huge polar bear met his gaze at some small distance off. Nothing would have been easier than to avoid the bear; but the plucky hunter approached the brute, and fired a charge of small shot right into the face in order to blind him. Running off, he attempted to ram a new charge into the muzzle of his gun; but the enraged bear had found out his whereabouts by scent alone, and was soon close upon him. The Eskimo drew off his heavy skin-coat, flung it in the direction of the bear, and then ran further off to finish loading. While the enraged animal was tearing his coat to shreds, he gave it the second charge in the side. Before he finally killed it, the hunter had to part also with his skin boots in the same way.

In midwinter, when nights are long and days short, when terrific snow-storms sweep the coast, when the black bear dozes in his long, wintry sleep, then we collect our little flock of Eskimos around our mission station. What seemed in spring, summer, and autumn a deserted village, now becomes full of life, music and song. The months from the first of Advent down to the end of March or beginning of April, are our spiritual harvest-time. We come into touch with each individual of our flock; we see their failings, and also their virtues, and often have good reason to rejoice over their spiritual progress. During this long winter-time, we hold services every day of the week. We preach to them in their own mother-tongue. We

THE SINNER'S FRIEND

A Sermon Preached on the Twenty-Sixth Anniversary of the Bowery Mission, New York, by Rev. J. Ross Stevenson, D.D.*

JESUS was a popular preacher. With his first sermon, his fame went out in all directions, and brought large audiences. Great multitudes followed him, and at times the throng became so dense that they trod upon one another. All classes were included in his audiences, and along with the scholars of the day were the common people who heard him gladly. But he had his critics. His discourses were often denounced. They were full of hard sayings; they were too plain and outspoken, and the feelings of some who listened were hurt. His audiences were sneered at. At times, they were composed for the most part of the lower classes. His own character was attacked. He associated with bad people, it was said. On one occasion, when a large congregation of publicans and sinners assembled to hear him, the Pharisees and Scribes, the highly respectable and self-righteous religionists of the time, murmured, saying: "This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them." That was true. Christ did not deny the charge; he accepted it, and he gloried in it. His conduct, which his enemies condemned, but which his sympathetic friends can only commend, furnishes us an appropriate theme for this occasion.

Christ's fellowship with sinners. It will help us to understand this fellowship if we consider its extent, its extenuation, and its extension.

The Sin-Bearer

I. Its extent. In no sense did Jesus condone the sin of those whom he touched. To him sin was an awful reality, against which his pure nature revolted. Henry Drummond was a man of saintly character who associated with sinners. At times, he was almost overwhelmed with the burden of men's sins, and coming out from an inquiry room where he had given counsel to many distressed souls, he was heard to exclaim: "Oh, I am sick with the sins of these men! How can God bear it!" How much more heavily this burden of human sin must have pressed upon the tender spirit of our Lord! In very truth, he entered into sin, never committing it, although he assumed it for others, and endured the sorrow of it so that it broke his heart, and crucified him on Calvary, and thus atonement for it was made. His whole mission had reference primarily to the putting away of sin. And by him sin was not regarded in any superficial way; it was man's most radical disease, which deserved God's wrath and curse both in this life, and that which is to come.

In no particular did he make sentimental apologies for sinners. He did not attempt to excuse them by saying that they were the victims of heredity whose innate tendencies must be overcome by education or by the taste for the beautiful and the good. Nor did he argue that the sinners and social outcasts of his time were the mere creatures of circumstance, whose environment had been unfavorable to proper development, and who needed, in order to righteousness, better homes, better food, better clothing, and purer sanitation. All those people who gathered about him were sinners, whose distinguishing characteristic was their sin, and who needed more than anything else the cleansing of the heart, the purifying of the whole nature, the sanctification of the entire man. And if any difference was to be noted among men in the matter of their sin, it was only this: that those lowest down in the scale of humanity were most conscious of their sin, and were more hopeful than those higher up, who covered over their sin with the cloak of self-righteousness.

Individual Ministration

Such sinners Christ not only received when they came to him, he went out in search for them. His ambition was not to address great multitudes; he did not use his apostles as an advertising bureau to get large congregations, although he was always glad to preach to the great assemblies when there was opportunity to do so. But this was only on special occasions. His usual way of working was with the individual. Each soul had to him a priceless worth, and he was just as eloquent when speaking to Nathaniel or to the woman of Samaria as he was when the crowds gathered about him by the Sea of Galilee.

But more than this, he actually lived with sinners. This was true of his whole earthly career. We speak of it as his humiliation.

His Sojourn Among Men

was a mission to the slums. And he came to this world, not for the purpose of investigation; not to gather statistics and study the problem of the unreached masses, so as to be able to carry back a report to heaven on the actual conditions. He came here to save, taking upon him our own nature, submitting to all human experiences, making himself one with us. And as he went about his ministry, he walked and talked with sinners. He went into their homes; he dined at their tables, when invited to do so, and although he had no home of his own, he provided a feast for the multitudes. He assumed that all belonged to the same family, and that he was a true brother and friend. He was tempted in all points as we are, yet without sin. This was a new thing in Israel.

Rev. J. Ross Stevenson, D.D.

The religious leaders of the time could not understand it, and when they found fault with him, Jesus on several occasions made an explanation, and accounted for his conduct.

Sought the Needy

II. Its extenuation. Such fellowship was in keeping with the business of his life, as he explained on one occasion when fault was found with him for dining with Matthew the Publican. He replied that he was a physician who had only to do with the sick; he came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance. Or, as he explained his mission in this chapter, he was like a shepherd whose chief concern must be for lost sheep. Any man who searched for what he had lost, was simply following his natural instincts. He was like the woman who lost the piece of silver, and would not rest content until a lamp had been lighted, the house swept, and a diligent search made. He was like a father whose sinful son had strayed far away, but who, in real penitence, had come back again, and who therefore must be given a warm welcome. How then, could fault be found with a Saviour for associating with the very ones he had come to save?

Such fellowship was with the most hopeful class. It is the tendency of abundance, whether it be of money or of knowledge or of influence, or even of religious privilege, to withdraw the affections from the source of all good, and centre them upon self, so that the real needs of the soul are not recognized. Hence it is that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called, but God hath chosen the poor of this world to be rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which he promised to them that love him. The largest number of recruits for the church of Christ come to-day from that class which modern society would designate as publicans and sinners. Think of the great mass movements in certain parts of India! Think of the multitudes who are pressing into the church of Korea, and it is ample justification of Christ's method of associating with sinners.

The First Response

Such fellowship secures the largest return of devotion. We read that when Christ was in the home of Simon the Pharisee, while he sat at meat, a woman who was a sinner, brought an alabaster box of ointment, and stood behind him weeping, and began to wash his feet with her tears, to wipe them with her hair, to kiss his feet, and anoint them with the ointment. Simon's sense of propriety was shocked. He had some acquaintance with the woman, and did not consider her fit company for any guest of his. So he spake within himself, saying: "This man, if he were a prophet, would have known who and what manner of woman this is that toucheth him, for she is a sinner." Christ interrupted his meditations with this parable: "There was a certain creditor which had two debtors. The one owed five hundred pence, and the other fifty. And when they had nothing to pay, he frankly forgave them both. Tell me, therefore, which of them will love him most?" And Simon answered correctly when he said: "I suppose he to whom he forgave most." And, as a rule, to-day, the most earnest and most devoted Christians are those who have felt most keenly their sin: who have been plucked as brands from the burning: who have a deep realization of what God has done for their souls, and, consequently, are eager to requite his love with the most earnest and devoted service.

Such fellowship, in the long run, reaches all classes. Just as the husbandman drives his ploughshare into the ground, and turns the subsoil to the top, and the top to the bottom, so, in the upheaval of Providence, the upper classes and the lower classes are constantly changing places. The men of influence, of position, and of power to-day, in a majority of instances at least, have come from humble homes, and the method of the Gospel is to catch them first in their humility before they reach the place where pride is so apt to dominate. Instead of beginning at the upper crust of society, and working downward, the method of the Gospel is to begin at the bottom, and work upward. This was Christ's way. He did not reject the religious teachers of his time, but he went on the principle that he must reach first the publicans in order to get at the Pharisees, just as in foreign lands to-day, the heathen outcasts come into the kingdom before the heathen high-caste are affected.

A World-Wide Mission

III. Its extension. The practice of Jesus must, therefore, extend throughout the whole church if the world is to be brought to Christ. Think of the task which has been assigned to the church of our own time! Primarily, it is to bring sinners to a saving knowledge of Jesus Christ. This is the central, the most important thing. It radiates to the whole circumference of being, and everything else in life may be related to it. If this is to be accomplished, the Gospel of Christ's salvation must be brought to the masses. How are these great multitudes of people on whom Jesus would have compassion to-day, as he did of old, seeing that they are like sheep scattered, and, having no shepherd, how are they to be reached? We cannot induce them to come to our churches. The church must go to them with the message of Christ's compassion and Christ's ability to save.

* Pastor of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York. "This man receiveth sinners and eateth with them" Luke 15: 2.

This task can only be accomplished through personal contact, through fellowship. "The disciple is no greater than his master." And not one of us can initiate means or methods which are any improvement upon Christ's own. His mission is our commission. As the Father sent him, so he sends us, and when his spirit is incarnated in us, we shall seek to do his work only in his way, and it remains to-day, as it has always been, the most effective method. Multitudes who grope in darkness among the foreign nations seeking the light, will only come to a knowledge of the truth when the missionary whose mind is illuminated in the knowledge of Christ goes to them, and shines before them as a light set in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation. The vast hordes of immigrants who peacefully invade our own shores, can only be claimed for Jesus, by some one who goes to them, and, in their own tongue, speaks to them the Word of Life. And the hundreds and thousands who live in the more wicked parts of our city cannot be influenced at long range. There must be personal contact; there must be Christlike fellowship with them.

We rejoice, therefore, that institutions such as the Bowery Mission have been established, and that to-day, as of old, God is blessing their Christlike methods. The Mission, in whose honor we are met this afternoon, follows literally the example of Jesus: It receives sinners; it eats with them; it lives with them; it is planted where they are to be found in the largest numbers. In the quarter of a century through which the Bowery Mission has lived, the Gospel has been faithfully proclaimed night after night; and that, by those on whom the spirit of Christ has rested, and to those who have been ready to receive the message. Heaven rejoices even now over the great numbers who have thus been led to repentance, and who have been saved to a better life. We congratulate the Mission on the helpful, self-denying, and most fruitful endeavors of the past, and earnestly pray that its stakes may be strengthened, its cords lengthened, so as to be able in the days to come to attempt even greater things for God in the redemption of this great city.

A CENTURY'S WORK FOR SOULS

The Centennial Celebration of Bedford Street M. E. Church

Its Remarkable History

ONE hundred years have made great changes in that part of New York City known in the old days as "Greenwich Village." A century ago, the settlement was a mile or more north of the city proper, and was bounded by Bank Street, Greenwich Avenue, Carmine Street, and the North or Hudson River. There was then but one place of worship, a Dutch Reformed Church. At this period there lived in Morton Street (very near the site of the present Methodist parsonage), one Samuel Walgrove, a devout Methodist, who opened his home for meetings held by those of his faith. When the congregation became too large for the house, Mr. Walgrove gave the brethren the use of his carpenter shop, and amid surroundings eminently suggestive of the early life of Jesus, the little society worshiped until 1810, when the present site, on the corner of Bedford and Morton Streets, was selected.

Rev. George A. MacDonald, the Pastor

The first church building, a frame church with shingled sides, was erected soon afterward. It fronted on Bedford Street, and as the years went by, became known as the "Old Bedford Street Church," a name which calls up tender and loving memories to many who, though no longer worshiping within its walls, hold it sacred as the place where they first found the Saviour.

Two large willow trees made inviting the entrance to the church, and a row of stately Lombardy poplars along the Morton Street side were not more upright and uncompromising in attitude than were the fathers of American Methodism toward evil. Here they preached, when visiting the "village," as they came around on the circuit.

Those were the days of strenuous preaching, if not of strenuous living. It is still told how Freeborn Garretson once—in the earnestness of his exhortation—split the book-board with a blow of his fist. Bishop Asbury and other celebrated divines preached in the old church, which, in 1830 was enlarged, and a new altar built. This same altar is now in use in the Sunday School room. In 1840, the present edifice was erected under the pastorate of Rev. Phineas Rice. It was a day long to be remembered by Bedford Street, when the cornerstone was laid by the celebrated Rev. Robert Newton of England. Another day of marked importance was that on which the dedication sermon was preached by Bishop Hedding.

Many years passed before the church was spoken of as "downtown." In those years, thousands knelt before its altars, finding the peace which passeth all understanding, and in turn going out to work in the vineyard of the Lord. At last, the great, restless, ever-growing city, reached the old church and passed it by; but there it stands to-day, staunch and true. Congregation after congregation have met, worshiped, been comforted, and have passed from its courts and walls, to the "Temple not made with hands." Many have moved to distant points; but pulpit and pew, with ever-changing occupants, have never been wanting in zeal up to the present time, when, as Pastor MacDonald expresses it: "Beside our regular members, we have a neighborhood of all nations to draw from."

During the recent Centennial services, lasting for a week, the programme has been varied and interesting. A number of former pastors were present, and addressed the various meetings. On Sunday, November 19th, the celebration began with a Sunrise Prayer-meeting. The forenoon numbers consisted of a song service, led by Thomas Duncan, a Testimony Meeting led by the pastor, Rev. George A. MacDonald, and sermon by Prof. E. S. Tipple, D.D. At two P. M. the Sunday School services were held, Mr. Robert W. Courtney, Sup't. The Laymen's Meeting was addressed by Dr. Louis Klopsch, proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, formerly a member of this church. Other speakers followed. The Epworth prayer-meeting was led by Mr. Charles Van Aken, and in the evening, Rev. Charles L. Mead, D.D., preached. A reception was held the next day to former pastors and members, which proved a most interesting occasion, many of the old members coming a great distance to participate in this meeting of old-time friends and workers. On Tuesday there was a rally of Evangelical Churches of the Ninth Ward. Stirring addresses were made by the different pastors. The remainder of the week was devoted to prayer and praise services, sermons and addresses by Rev. A. E. Burnett, Rev. James S. Chadwick, D.D., Rev. C. L. Goodell, Rev. Stephen Merritt, and others. The morning sermon on Sunday, November 26th, was preached by Bishop E. G. Andrews, D.D., and in the evening, Rev. Philip M. Waters, D.D., occupied the pulpit.

Bedford M. E. Church, New York City

It was a glorious occasion for renewal of old-time friendships, and the beginning of new. Methodist fervor never was warmer than during this season of family reunion. Hearts were full, and eyes were wet, while voices tremulous told the story of never-failing love and interest in the old church. Men grown gray in the Master's service, recalled the days when every seat was filled each Sabbath, and women lovingly spoke of the time "when we were young, and husband and I sat in that very pew."

Pastor MacDonald, who now occupies the pulpit, speaks in very encouraging terms of the immediate future of the parish. He is very much alive to the needs of the neighborhood, and feels that the earnest desire which he has for the betterment of the people will, in time, be felt by them. Then the walls of the old church will be none too large to hold those who will come seeking the Master, and who, having found him, will try to save others, who are now so indifferent to the gentle call: "Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy-laden."

THE WEEK OF PRAYER

Topics Suggested by the Evangelical Alliance

Sunday, Jan. 7.—Sermons. The Spirit and the Fire. Suggested texts Matt. 3: 11, 12; Matt. 7: 16.

Monday, Jan. 8.—For a revival which shall bring professing Christians into more vital relation to Christ. Matt. 3: 11, 12; Mal. 3: 3; John 15: 5; John 17: 18.

Tuesday, Jan. 9.—For a revival which shall renew the churches of every name into full accord with the mind and will of Christ. Acts 2: 1, 4, 41; Rev. 2: 23.

Wednesday, Jan. 10.—For a revival which shall convince and convict the unsaved. John 16: 8; John 3: 36; 2 Cor. 5: 11.

Thursday, Jan. 11.—For a revival which, saving the individual, shall also save society. Luke 4: 18, 19; Matt. 6: 10; Matt. 7: 12.

Friday, Jan. 12.—For a revival which shall fill each Christian heart with missionary devotion. Rev. 22: 16; Acts 20: 24; Mark 16: 15.

Saturday, Jan. 13.—For a revival which shall exalt anew the world-wide Fatherhood of God and the world-wide brotherhood of men as revealed in Christ the Lord. Gen. 1: 2; John 3: 34; Acts 17: 26; James 2: 8; Matt. 6: 10.

Sunday, Jan. 14.—Sermons. Conditions of blessing. Suggested text, Mal. 3: 10.

Results of the Inter-Church Conference

THREE important documents were approved by the Inter-Church Conference, in Carnegie Hall, New York, at its concluding sessions, as summarizing and expressing the results of the deliberations reported in this journal last week. These were: (1) A statement embodying resolutions, describing the objects it was desired to achieve through the Federation; (2) a plan of federation defining the part each denomination shall have in the work, and the duties to be intrusted to the Federal Council, with the functions of the Executive Committee, and (3) a letter to the churches explaining the decisions of the Conference, and inviting the acceptance of the plan.

The statement of resolutions deals with the Family, the Social Order, Education, Religious Activities and International Affairs.

Under the head of the Family, it urges on parents the supreme importance of religion in the home and of religious education of the children. It urges on legislators the need of uniform and better divorce laws. It appeals to ministers to maintain the New Testament ideals of marriage and re-marriage. It pleads for the restriction of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors "to the utmost limit righteously enforceable," and especially to undeveloped and aboriginal races.

Concerning the Social Order, the Conference pleads for the distribution of wealth according to the law of God, in beneficence instead of extravagance. As to the Labor troubles, it declares for a better relation between employers and employees, by "each party patiently endeavoring to appreciate the other, and by co-operating with all in creating by evolution the best social system and complete social harmony." It also protests against "graft" in public office and in corporations. It protests against gambling and betting; and, finally, has this stringent resolution against social impurity: "That in the enactment and enforcement of laws against impurity, we believe the great saying of Gladstone should be decisive, that 'it is the purpose of the law to make it as hard as possible to do wrong, and as easy as possible to do right,' and this principle, as well as the results of experience, we believe to be against all schemes of segregation and regulation, and that, in the words of President Roosevelt, 'the only way to reduce the consequences of this vice is to reduce the vice,' which can be accomplished by educating our youth in the laws of purity, and by protecting them against the foul literature, and pictures, and shows, that corrupt the chambers of imagery, and kindle the flames of a passion intended for pure and noble purposes."

The resolution on education contends for the paramount interest in every grade being made the cultivation of moral character.

Concerning religious activities, the Conference lays down this rule for the guidance of all the churches: "That in pushing the frontiers of the kingdom of heaven on earth we earnestly urge all missionary bodies for work, both at home and abroad, that they establish methods of comity and co-operation where they are not already begun, and in all cases carry out such methods to the fullest degree practicable." The Conference added, that "having already learned to combine our Christian endeavors along many lines without impairing the efficiency of the distinctive truths which we feel ourselves severally commissioned to emphasize, the time has now come to put redoubled devotion and united energy into the three supreme lines of service common to all, namely: evangelization, Christian education, and ministration."

In International affairs, the Conference protests against the cruelties practised on the Congo, and insists that "nothing less than the immediate, thoroughgoing and permanent righting of those tragic wrongs can satisfy the conscience of Christendom," and urges that our government should take action to promote an International inquiry into the facts of the situation.

Thus, already, a programme of work, in which all the churches in the Conference can unite, has been drawn up and has been endorsed by their accredited representatives and is recommended for united action.

The plan of federation prepared by the Committee appointed for the purpose and adopted by the Conference, provides for the organization of a Federal Council, which shall consist of representatives from every denomination approving the plan. Each denomination is to have four representatives and one more for every fifty thousand of its communicants. This Council is to hold its first meeting in December, 1908, which allows time for the national councils and conferences of the various churches to pass officially on the plan and appoint representatives. Thereafter the Council will assemble once in every four years. It is to have no authority over the constituent bodies represented on it, either to formulate a creed, or appoint a form of worship, but only to recommend a course of action in matters of common interest.

The Federal Council will elect an Executive Committee, consisting of seven ministers and seven laymen, together with the officers of the Federal Council. This Committee will have power to transact all business of the Federal Council in the intervals between its meetings.

The following denominations, officially represented in the Conference, are invited to accept the plan and appoint members of the Federal Council:

The Baptist Churches of the United States.
The Free Baptist General Conference.
The Christians (The Christian Connection).
The Congregational Churches.
The Disciples of Christ.
The Evangelical Association.
The Evangelical Synod of North America.
The Evangelical Lutheran Church. General Synod.
The Methodist Episcopal Church.
The Methodist Episcopal Church, South.
The Primitive Methodist Church.
The Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America.
The Methodist Protestant Church.
The African Methodist Episcopal Church.
The African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church.
The General Conference of the Mennonite Church of North America.
The Friends.
The Moravian Church
The Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A.
The Cumberland Presbyterian Church.
The Welsh Calvinistic Methodist or Presbyterian Church.
The Reformed Presbyterian Church.
The United Presbyterian Church.
The Protestant Episcopal Church.
The Reformed Church in America.
The Reformed Church in the U. S. A.
The Reformed Episcopal Church.
The Seventh Day Baptist Churches.
The United Brethren in Christ.
The United Evangelical Church.

The third document authorized by the Conference, is a letter to the various churches, recounting the movements leading to the assembling of the Conference. It proceeds to describe the appointment of a Committee of forty, which prepared the plan of Federation, which, with slight modification was adopted by the Conference. It goes on to recapitulate the objects that it is hoped Federation will achieve, the advantages of united action, and expresses the hope that each church receiving a copy of the plan will officially endorse it and appoint representatives to the Federal Council.

Thus the Conference has discharged the duty committed to it, of ascertaining the mind of the churches, through their accredited representatives, and finding them unanimous in desiring Federation, has formulated a plan by which Federation may become effective. It remains now for the churches to complete the work of the Conference, by appointing to the Federal Council the representatives to which they are entitled.

A Revival Among Soldiers and Sailors

BY GEORGE T. B. DAVIS

DR. R. A. TORREY and Mr. Charles M. Alexander have just concluded a month's revival campaign at Plymouth, England, and over 3,000 declared their conversion, including a large number of soldiers and sailors. The historic city of Plymouth, from which the Mayflower set sail in 1620, is one of the leading naval and military centres in England. Over 20,000 soldiers are garrisoned in forts and barracks in and about the city, while the harbor is frequently filled with English warships, or foreign fleets. In the neighboring town of Devonport there is a Royal Naval Dockyard, in which 9,000 men are employed in naval construction.

The revival meetings of the evangelist were held in a huge military drill hall, which had been doubled in size, at a cost of $9,500. The body of the big building was filled with chairs; a gallery ran across the rear, and at the front was a steeply-inclined platform accommodating 850 singers. The hall seated over 6,000, and was frequently packed to the doors, while throngs stood in the streets, unable to obtain admittance. From the first day the work or the revivalists proved a glorious success. The city was stirred as probably never before in its history, while a revival fire was started among the soldiers and sailors which, it is hoped, will spread over the entire army and navy.

A special section of the Drill Hall was reserved for soldiers and sailors, where a company of them in uniform sat in a body, while others, both in uniform and in plain clothes, were scattered throughout the audience. Soon after the meetings began, Mr. Alexander made his red and blue patch of service men into a supplementary choir, calling upon them to stand up and sing the verses of certain hymns, while the great audience and trained choir joined in the chorus. The favorite song of the "King's Choir" was "Leanon His Arms," and it became a regular custom for them to call for it night after night. Mr. Alexander invariably acceded to their request, and it was a beautiful sight to see the strong body of men stand up and sing with all their might:

Just lean upon the arms of Jesus,
He'll help you along, help you along;
If you will trust his love unfailing,
He'll fill your heart with song.

Dr. Torrey and Mr. Alexander, with Soldier Converts

No one took a keener interest in the proceedings than did the redcoats and bluejackets, and each night it was a touching spectacle to see one or two—and sometimes four or five—of them going boldly to the front to confess Christ as their Saviour.

A marine one day told me the following incident, which shows how many of them are being set on fire to win others for Christ. He said that one Saturday afternoon twenty-three marines started out about two o'clock, walked several miles to a neighboring village, and spent the afternoon parading the streets of the town, and holding brief open-air meetings on the street corners. Then they had tea, and walked back to the Drill Hall for the evening service, singing revival hymns as they went. In the meeting, they did active personal work as usual, and when it was over, they went on to a Soldiers' Home, where they attended two prayer meetings. They reached their barrack gates at midnight.

No one can estimate the influence that will be exerted in the years to come by these soldier and sailor converts. Already they are beginning to scatter, some going to other military stations in England, and some to service in distant colonies, while the marines and sailors are embarking on cruisers and battleships, bound for places in Africa, India, and China.

SOCIAL SETTLEMENTS IN INDIA

A Glance at the Progress Made in Certain Localities Under Missionary Auspices

By REV. E. BULLARD, of Kavali

IN India, the foreign missionary work, taken as a whole, has been well called a great Social Settlement work. In its spirit, it certainly may be so interpreted, and every mission station is, in a general way, but another such Social Settlement as those established in Christian lands. In India, some Missions are demonstrating the same principle, however, in a more concrete manner, by establishing Settlements of native Christians, more or less associated with some kind of industrial work. These have sometimes been called "Peasant Settlements." The word is unsuited to the broad idea of Social Settlements, for not only are the poor and peasant classes in India the proper subjects for mission or Settlement work, but all classes, since all are sunk in heathen degradation, and none can become Christians without practically being outcasted and classed with the lowest strata of society. Indeed, in a few instances, such Settlements have been formed more especially for the benefit of the highest classes, and a truly Christian Settlement should be open to any and every class.

Mrs. Bullard and Some of Her Classes in Needlework at Kavali

Much prejudice and misgiving as to the utility and necessity of such work has doubtless existed in the past; but we believe these are being rapidly laid aside, and foreign missions seem to be about to engage universally in social and industrial work, as they have done hitherto in educational and medical work. India presents one of the most interesting fields, perhaps, for such work, of any in all the world: first, because of the notable poverty-stricken condition of its millions of people, and the almost insuperable obstacles in the way of reform under existing conditions; second, because of the prevalence of caste and of the village system, in consequence of which this great population is almost entirely settled in villages, which enables the propagators of caste to hold the people in bondage to their decrees from generation to generation, even though the Hindu religion be forsaken; third, because it seems to be the only way whereby native Christians may, as a rule, become able to support the work of the Gospel among themselves, and avoid the stigma and bane of perpetual dependence upon foreign aid; and fourth, because a well-conducted system of Social Settlements cannot but be one of the greatest possible missionary educators and evangelizing agencies in the land. For these weighty reasons, we believe the work of Social Settlements in India to be a department of Christian activity worthy of the most careful study, and most earnest effort of God's people of to-day. Circumstances differ in different parts of the country, and any attempt to formulate a plan for all parts of the country must be beset with great difficulties. There is, however, after all, a wonderful sameness in the natural resources of the country, as well as in the native capacity of the people throughout the land, and the general principles on which such a department of Christian work rests, certainly remain the same in all parts. Every mission and every station must conduct the work in any case on its own lines. Leaving, therefore, the more general questions, and those of other localities than our own, to others, we wish here to say a few words as to how we believe the great work of Social Settlements may be successfully carried out in one part of India at least, and perhaps in many other parts. We would advocate self-supporting missionary Settlements of native Christians, not only at the Mission Stations, but in all the principal villages on the fields of our Stations, as object lessons, and to develop so many companies of Christian lay-workers, who will be able to extend the system year by year to new villages, until every town and large village has such a Settlement, where Christianity in all its social, industrial, educational and hygienical phases may be seen, exemplified in the actual lives of these communities day by day. That such Settlements would do much for the conversion of the heathen and the upbuilding of the native converts, and would become most valuable adjuncts to the more directly evangelical work of touring and preaching the Gospel, seems beyond a doubt. To accomplish this end it is highly important that such Settlements should be established from the outset on a basis of self-support and of missionary activity.

A Rescued Girl

India Orphan Children Learning to Sing Christian Hymns

A few years ago, a Mission Station was opened in a county seat on one of the principal railroads of Southern India. The people were evidently very poor, the country unproductive and uninviting, while bigotry and prejudice were strong. Year by year, however, the Lord gave converts. Past experience of many years led the missionaries to feel the necessity of something more than paid agents, located among the poor and scattered Christians in heathen villages. Nor did it seem sufficient that the Christians should merely support their pastor, if they could. Something more was felt to be needed, something that would raise the social standard of the Christians and the Christian workers. A small Settlement was opened, and to make this self-supporting, industrial and commercial work was undertaken in such articles as were in demand among European firms in the nearest cities. All proved to be more or less profitable. A piece of land had been secured, and in this a well was dug, by which means, even in the midst of drought and famine, good crops were raised. Not only were a number of Christian families supported in the Settlement, but employment was given to hundreds in the surrounding country; and before three years had passed the work was more than self-supporting, prejudice had vanished to a great degree, and for many miles around the Gospel had found an entrance, and won its way where before it had been rejected and despised. Government, moreover, was favorable, and more lands in other villages were granted and public contracts offered, till it was evident that the work was a growing one, and one that would soon become self-propagating and indigenous. No longer could any doubt exist, for if with the raw material and native appliances only, in so poor a part of the country, a fair amount of success could be attained so soon, how much more would this be the case if useful and helpful appliances from abroad could be introduced, such as pumps with small engines for irrigation, and a few simple machines for manufacturing purposes. Indeed, in a few places such machines have been introduced by the Government and by others, and are proving, as we are assured, highly profitable. With a few acres of land and a small plant of simple machinery, such a station, we believe, could be made both self-supporting and evangelizing in a few years.

A Social Settlement Hut

It is not proposed to take the Christians out from their old homes, as a rule, and colonize them in villages of their own, but to admit a few, selected for their fitness for such work, to occupy the Settlement houses and lands held by the Mission, for a limited number of years, paying the usual share of the crops to the Mission, as the owners of the land, till they should be able either to go out and aid in opening new Settlements, or to take up lands for themselves, while others succeed them in the Settlement. Giving in Secret

AMID a long and varied experience in Christian work, philanthropic and otherwise, there are few incidents that have given us greater pleasure than those that have to do with secret benevolences. On another page of the present issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, we make announcement of what is truly a "Royal Thanksgiving Gift."—$2,400 spontaneously donated by a reader of this journal, to be apportioned where it will accomplish the greatest good, at home and abroad.

How that apportionment has been made the list of beneficiaries will show. In that single gift, made without ostentation and with a privacy that is impenetrable, as far as the giver's personality is concerned, almost every religious denomination now engaged in the Lord's work on this continent and in missionary lands, will have an equal share.

There are, in this land of ours, a great many golden-hearted men and women, who believe in and practice doing good in secret. It is to them a double sacrament. They extinguish self and spend themselves in His Name, for the sake of others. It would embarrass them to have their benevolences proclaimed, and it would rob their self-sacrificing work of half its virtue and more than half its pleasure. They "do good by stealth and blush to find it fame," but even this fame — the applause of men—they care little about. What is done for Jesus' sake needs no trumpeter. It will bear its own witness in that day when all reckonings are made up, and when each one of us will give account of the uses we have made of our talents and our opportunities.

Church Union

WITH remarkable unanimity, in delightful contrast with some ancient Church Councils, the Conference on Federation, held in Carnegie Hall, New York, has deliberated, and, after careful consideration, has formulated a practical plan for united action. It made it no part of its duty to define doctrine, to denounce heresy, or to impose any creed or form of worship on the constituent churches; but confined its attention to organizing a plan for the unification and concentration of Christian forces. The enemies of the Church of Christ are a united band, while the soldiers of the Cross have hitherto been a divided company, oftentimes moved by mutual rivalry and open hostility. It is not astonishing that they have failed to act effectively against the common enemy. Abuses have grown up in society that have been deplored and condemned by each of the churches, but no powerful and commanding voice has protested against them. A feeble protest has come from this and that church, but the men who were leading the crusade of graft could afford to defy the opposition of bodies so small and so uninfluential. It will be a different thing when the protest is uttered by a body representing nearly twenty million persons.

The plan adopted by the Conference, outlined on another page of this issue, is probably the best possible under the circumstances. Its defects will reveal themselves in the work, and a provision in the plan itself indicates the means of remedying them. Each denomination affiliated will appoint representatives, who will compose a Federal Council. This will meet once in four years. The Council will elect an Executive Committee of seven ministers, seven laymen, and the chief officers of the Council, who will deal with the questions that arise in the intervals between the meetings of the Council, and will practically represent the affiliated churches.

There are to be five spheres of action: The Family, Social Condition, Education, Religious Activities, and International Affairs. In each department reforms are urgently needed, and it is a significant fact that the churches represented in the Conference were agreed as to what those reforms are. All the churches, and many individuals outside the churches, desire those reforms, and there is now to be an agency which will concentrate and embody the united demand of the whole Christian community for them. In only one instance was the ecclesiastical spirit manifested. That was in the exclusion of the Unitarian and Universalist bodies. Those two churches, however, will be in hearty sympathy with the Council in its efforts to achieve its objects, and none will rejoice more cordially in its success.

Apart from the practical results of the Conference, the fact of its being held at all, and of its cordiality and unanimity, are matters for congratulation. The world can no longer reproach the church with its divisions. The denominations remain, their differences of creed and church government continue, but they are united in opposition to wickedness and wrong-doing, and they recognize one another as comrades in the great war for the truth and the right.

The Old Hymns and Their Critics

OF late years, it has become quite customary to expect, at more or less regular intervals, a broadside against the old hymnology. At almost every church Conference, some worthy pastor comes forward to the attack, burning with ardor to demolish the quaint, old-time words and the melodious airs that brought joy to the hearts of our early youth, and sweet comfort and spiritual uplift to many a poor, wandering, sin-sick soul. It is true, in the multitude of hymnals, there are many hymns of such little value that, if they were dropped in bulk, they would hardly be missed by the average congregation; but, on the other hand, there are many, which, by reason of their deep spirituality, intrinsic literary merit and tender association, would be very much missed indeed. Yet it is against these dear old favorites, with their ancient charm and saintly quality, that the stoutest assaults are usually made. We recall how, a little while ago, some Boanerges hurled his shafts of denunciation at Rev. Dr. Rankin's grand old inspiring hymn, "Till We Meet Again," which has brought tears to the eyes and a thrill to the hearts of many a "missionary farewell" gathering.

"Abide With Me" has been attacked with similar injustice. And others, equally well known and widely beloved, have met the same treatment. And now an Indiana clergyman, addressing the recent Psalmody Convention at Princeton in that State, has taken for his special target Dr. Newman's famous hymn, "Lead, Kindly Light," which he declares "may mean anything that any man chooses to make it mean, be he Christian, atheist, or Buddhist."

It seems hardly necessary to defend a hymn which the ablest judges have ranked as among the hundred best hymns of the Christian Church, and which is placed side by side with the beautiful productions of Toplady, Wesley, Newton, Bonar, Heber and Watts. "Lead, Kindly Light," is an appeal for spiritual guidance, and an expression of faith. Surely the writer of that beautiful hymn, while he was struggling through the darkness, must have had in mind the "pillar of cloud," Israel's "Kindly light," or that greater "Light of the World," to which all men look for help and guidance.

There are hymns that have carved for themselves an individual record in the field of spiritual service, and this is one of them. There are spiritual songs of power, of strong affirmative faith, of jubilant praise, of almost frenzied appeal, of Gospel encouragement. This is one of consolation in bereavement; of sanctified hope and trust when all around is dark and ominous; of simple rest on the Divine goodness. It will remain as a beautiful classic, in spite of the critics. Sankey, Phillips, Jacobs and Alexander—probably the greatest of singing evangelists—in a century have each testified to the power of Gospel song in drawing the multitudes to Christ. In its own especial realm of consolation, "Lead Kindly Light" has this power. It lifts the sorrowing heart heavenward.

Norway's New King

BY the time this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD reaches its readers, Norway's new king, Haakon VII, will be seated on the throne, and steering the viking ship of state through the troubled waters of "world politics." The selection of Prince Charles of Denmark can be regarded as most fortunate for the three Scandinavian countries concerned. The royal families of the North are now so closely related, that a confederation of Norway, Sweden and Denmark for mutual protection against the land-grabbing Powers, is not a remote possibility.

Prince Charles, or to give him his new title, King Haakon, is one of whom both his own and his adopted country may well be proud. Young, alert, progressive, of clean life and unstained name, he will stand well in the records of the historians who write the future history of Norway. He brings to the new government the element of strength so much needed at the present time. The fact that he is closely related to the Czar of Russia, may keep in check, to a certain extent, the strong desire of the Russian Bear to lay his paws on an attractive port in upper Norway, in order to secure a good naval base on the Atlantic. He is also son-in-law of King Edward VII of Great Britain, whose daughter will now be known as Queen Maud. In consequence, the Norwegians will have behind them the prestige, and even the military support of Great Britain, in case any other of the Powers attempt to aggrandize themselves at Norway's expense.

We are apt, in these democratic days, to underrate the importance of royal relationships; but any one who understands the British people, knows that they are proud that a princess of their country is Queen of Norway, and will back her interests with hearts of oak. Germany, also, seemed greatly pleased with the turn affairs have taken, and the Kaiser sent a warship to salute King Haakon on his way to his new capital. The separation of Sweden and Norway loses much of its sting for the former country, when they think that the new King is a grandson of King Carl XV, as he is also of Christian of Denmark; and this close kinship will do much to readjust the strained relations now existing between the two governments.

The title chosen for the King is one that warms the hearts of all loyal Norwegians. The Haakons, almost without exception, were men of might in the days of old; always leading in the very front of battle, and acting with wisdom at the council board. The first one, who ruled in the ninth century, was beloved by his people; and that such will be the happy lot of his successor, is the wish of all who have the welfare of Scandinavia at heart.

Among the Workers

—EVANGELIST JAMES H. CANNON is conducting a three weeks' Gospel campaign in connection with the Browne Memorial M. E. Church, Jersey City. The meetings are largely attended.

—DR. LYMAN ABBOTT and Dr. H. B. Trissell were the principal speakers at the breaking of ground for the new Colored Orphan Asylum buildings at Mount St. Vincent, N. Y., on November 20. The asylum was founded in 1836, and has sheltered and trained 4,313 children.

—THE UNION Evangelistic meetings, conducted by Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman at Minneapolis, Minn., closed November 15, after seventeen days of continuous services. One hundred churches united in the movement. The city was divided into sixteen districts. Hundreds confessed Christ at the meetings.

—ALVA, OKLAHOMA, is in the midst of a revival, directed by Dr. Francis E. Smiley, of Denver, Colo., and his Gospel singer, assisted by local pastors. A big tent, comfortably seated, lighted and heated, accommodating a thousand people, has been pitched upon the public square. Many conversions are reported. Dr. Smiley goes next to Woodward, Okla.

—CONTINENTAL, O., is a little place with only eleven hundred population. It has six saloons. The good people of the town are making a brave fight against the whisky traffic, which threatens to demoralize the entire place. They ask the prayers of God's people that the town may be relieved from its incubus, and especially that the attempt to flood it with free whisky on Christmas may be defeated. Surely, here is a good opening for a revivalist.

—JERSEY CITY, Hoboken, Bayonne, Hudson City, Newark, and Paterson, are all undergoing a very marked revival experience, the spiritual campaign having been carried into New Jersey by Dr. Wilbur J. Chapman and his co-workers, who have now returned from the West. Among those who are specially active in the work in New Jersey cities are Revs. R. A. Walton, D.D., J. R. Pratt, John A. Earl, H. W. Stough, Tilman Hobson, and Thomas Houston. Great meetings, with houses crowded to the doors, are reported in the various districts. In Hoboken, Revs. C. T. Schaeffer and L. G. Leggett have spoken to large audiences, the first to children the second to men. Dr. John Robertson, the Scottish evangelist, is leading the revival in Bayonne. At Paterson, 3,000 persons marched singing through the streets and held a midnight revival service in a theatre, and over 1,000 paraded in Jersey City and held a crowded meeting in a local playhouse. A rich spiritual harvest is expected from the New Jersey revival campaign.

The BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Pacifying Russia

EFFORTS are being made by Count Witte, with more encouraging results, to allay the seething discontent which pervades the whole of Russia. The Czar and the chiefs of the Government bureaus have had a scare, that has opened their eyes to the dangers of continued repression. Recent events have proved that the demand for constitutional rights comes not alone from the students in the Universities and the workingmen, but from the peasants, who are the most numerous class in the Empire. Hitherto it has been supposed that the peasants were too ignorant to understand what political rights belonged to them, and were enjoyed by the same class in other lands. They were believed to be patient, too, and so timid that they dare not unite against the landowners and the Government. But now it is no longer safe to count on those qualities. Classes have been organized in many districts, in which revolutionary leaders have explained to them the benefits they would derive from a Constitution. Thus all classes have been aroused to revolutionary fervor. The students raised the red flag; the workingmen quitted their service, paralyzing all industries; and the peasants in several provinces drove away their landlords and burned their houses. Even the loyalty of the army was in doubt.

It is not certain even now that revolution and anarchy are averted, but there are grounds for hope. The Zemstvo Congress held in Moscow, representing the moderate section of the Russian people, has made to Count Witte a conditional offer of support. If he will procure from the Czar an assurance that a Constituent Assembly shall be elected by universal suffrage and that the promises made in the recent manifesto shall be fulfilled, they will aid him in pacifying the people, and will advise the discontented classes to resume their occupations and wait for the promulgation of the Constitution. That their influence would be powerful with the people is not doubted. It is therefore probable that Count Witte will give them the pledges they demand. That course is apparently the one hope of averting the revolution. It will mean, however, the abandonment by the Czar of personal rule and the acceptance of a Parliament which will be the real government of the Empire. This is the critical hour for the dynasty. If the Czar fulfils his promises and yields to the demands of his people he may survive the storm; but any suspicion of bad faith, any sign that he contemplates reviving autocratic government will be fatal to him and his house.

That which is altogether just shalt thou follow, that thou mayest live and inherit the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee (Deut. 16: 20).

Propagandists Teaching the Russian Peasants the Principles of Liberty

The Sultan Menaced

Several months have elapsed since the demand was made on the Sultan of Turkey, by the chief European Powers, for reform in the administration of Macedonia and Adrianople. It was required of him that the collection of taxes in those provinces be taken out of the hands of the corrupt Turkish officers, who owe their positions to the favor of the court, and placed in the hands of Christians approved by the Powers. He was also required to confide the administration of justice in those provinces to a mixed Commission, which could be trusted to render impartial decisions, and restrain Mohammedan fanaticism. The Powers making these demands were England, France, Austria, Russia, and Italy. It was supposed that, menaced by a combination so powerful, the Sultan would yield. He has, however, to take into account the effect such a concession would have on the Mohammedan world, which recognizes him as its Caliph. He fears that it would regard the surrender of his power of collecting taxes and administering justice, as an abdication of sovereignty, and would renounce allegiance to him. Menaced with this danger, he has temporized, and evaded a direct reply, until the Powers have lost patience with him. They have now decided to make a maritime demonstration, in the hope of compelling him to yield. A fleet has been made up of war-vessels from each Power, and commanded by an Austrian Admiral. It has now set sail for the Bosphorus, with secret instructions as to the measures to be taken in the event of the Sultan remaining obdurate. At present there are no signs of his yielding. He has put the Dardanelles in a position of defence and is waiting to see what the Powers will do. It is thought that he bases hopes of resisting coercion, on the fact that Germany has declined to unite in the demonstration and may be induced to interpose in his favor. He also counts on the preoccupation of Russia and on the divisions in the internal affairs of Austria. The five Powers, however, realize that the discontent in Macedonia is a menace to the peace of Europe and are resolved that it shall be relieved. The deadlock is momentous and will be watched with keen interest, especially by all who hope that at last the scandal of Turkish rule in Europe is nearing its elimination.

I saw under the sun the place of judgment that wickedness was there; and the place of righteousness that iniquity was there: I said God shall judge the righteous and the wicked (Eccles. 3: 16, 17).

The House of Sorrows

Orders have been issued by the Board of Health of New York, that there shall be a cleansing and whitewashing and complete renovation of a house on the water-front of the city, which bears the pathetic name of "The House of Sorrows." A hundred years ago it was a substantial house of some consequence, occupied by a wealthy merchant, whose ships, riding in the dock, could be seen from its windows. Now, filthy without and within, it is rented by a woman, who takes in lodgers of the lowest kind. Only women are received, and these for a few cents may hire a blanket, in which they curl up on the floor. Women who peddle matches, who beg, and who prey on the sailors on the river side, are the principal occupants. Such squalor and misery as is witnessed in the rooms of that house cannot be equalled in the city. Yet, among the occupants are some who, a few years ago, were living in luxury and abundance, less than two miles farther uptown. The House of Sorrows is the last stage of the life of vice that seems so attractive at the beginning, and not a few of its occupants take the plunge from its doors into the river, and so end their wretched lives. It is a pity that those who are fascinated by that life at the beginning, could not be brought to look in on "The House of Sorrows," and take warning.

Her house inclineth unto death, and her paths unto the dead (Prov. 2: 18).

Students Raising the Red Flag at a Russian University

An Ophthalmic Magnet

A new instrument in surgery, specially constructed for the relief of injuries to the eye, has been set up in the hospital at Bridgeport, Conn. The use in the factories of the city of powerful lathes for the cutting of steel, has sent to the hospital for treatment many workmen who have splinters of steel imbedded in the eye. So sharp are these splinters, and with such force are they thrown off that they go deep into the eyeball, and often the sight has been destroyed in the attempt to cut them out. The increasing number of such cases inspired one of the surgeons to devise a magnet of extraordinary power, for use in drawing the splinters from the eye. After a series of experiments lasting through five months, the instrument has been completed and is now in use. It is made of soft iron and weighs nearly three hundred pounds. About the core are coils of heavy copper wire, each coil being as large as a water bucket. A little over a mile and a half of coarse copper wire is wound in the coils, and the electrical current required to energize this great magnet is so large that special wires had to be run from the dynamo room of the hospital. The patient to be operated on stands over the magnet, with his head in a brass frame. This is so adjusted that the injured eye can be brought directly over the head of the magnet, which it just escapes touching. When the current is turned on, any bit of iron or steel, however deeply imbedded, is bound to answer the imperative summons of the great instrument and appear under the cornea. By this means it is hoped that many whose sight is endangered may be relieved. What a blessing it would be to the world if the moral malady of selfishness and greed, which the Apostle compares to a disease of the eye, could be as effectually removed.

"For all that is in the world, the lust of the eyes and the pride of life is not of the Father but is of the world" (I John 2: 16).

A Solitary Honeymoon

A local journal of a country district in northern New York, gives an account of the peculiar wedding arrangements of two of the citizens. After describing the ceremony with admiring detail, the dresses of the ladies and the behavior of the men, it mentions the plans of the couple for the honeymoon. The bridegroom, it appears, will stay at home and attend to his business, while his bride will visit Niagara Falls, the Great Lakes, and Chicago. There may be special reasons in this case for the plan of spending the honeymoon separately, but it is, to say the least, somewhat unusual. They are evidently practical people, otherwise the bride would forego her trip, or the bridegroom forsake his business in order to enjoy one another's society. Unhappily their course, so unique in matrimonial arrangements, is not so uncommon in those unions with Christ, of which marriage is a type. In those, only too often, Christ has reason to complain that those who have pledged themselves to him do not seek his presence or prefer communion with him to their own gratification.

I marvel that ye are so soon removed from Him that called you (Gal. 1: 6).

BRIEF NOTES

The Lord Mayor of Liverpool, England, estimates that the money spent in that city annually for amusements amounts to fifteen million dollars.

Messrs. Torrey and Alexander began a mission at Plymouth, England, on Nov. 5. Plymouth was made Oxford, where they will hold their last services in Great Britain.

The British and Foreign Bible Society celebrated the raising of its Centenary Fund of $2,250,000, Nov. 7, with a great meeting in Albert Hall, London. President Roosevelt sent a letter of congratulation.

AROUND THE HOME HEARTH

Getting Ready for Christmas

THANKSGIVING is no sooner past, than everybody is on the qui vive for Christmas. The markets begin to wear a festive air of holiday on the opening days of December. The stores are filled with the abundance which characterizes this land of plenty. Before very long they will be decorated with holly and cedar, and the great piles of fruit, the turkeys, geese, and ducks awaiting the oven; the vegetables in variety, salad, celery and cranberries, too, with nuts, raisins, and everything else that can furnish a dinner, will show that it is to be Merry Christmas in most households. The farms have sent their quota to the city, the long freight trains rush across the continent, from one seaboard to the other. California and Florida supply New York with tropical fruits, the steamers come plying up the coast with their generous stores, and all tends towards Christmas. Not the markets alone, but the beautiful shops overflowing with glittering goods bear witness to the fact that times are booming, and that every one, young and old, rich and poor, will have a share in the Christmas joy.

Just now the question of most interest in many homes is what shall we give the dear ones? A great deal of the Christmas pleasure is folded up in the Christmas mystery. A gift is twice a gift if it be a surprise. If only we can make somebody happy by presenting him or her with something that gratifies a secret wish cherished, but unexpressed, the aroma of the day will be perfect. Love is very watchful. Children try to discover, often quite transparently, what particular thing will most please mother, or will best fill the measure of father's joy. Little fingers work diligently with knitting needles and bits of silk and wool. The long evenings are devoted by older people, women of course, to making shawls, and sweaters, and sacques, and slumber shoes that are dainty and comfortable, and will make somebody extremely glad. Men who have the better-filled pocketbooks saunter into shops, and buy what they wish to give. Quite helplessly they ask advice of clerks and saleswomen, and sometimes their gifts are most appropriate, and sometimes, alas, they are misfits. As a rule, the greater thought, and the more solicitous planning go into the gifts which women's hands hang on the Christmas tree.

A mistake is often made in procuring gifts for children, by those who think that to make children happy it is necessary to spend a great deal of money; as often the little girl prefers a doll of home-made manufacture, or an animal created out of canton flannel, cotton wool, and beads, to the most artistic and expensive production that has come from Paris. A boy would rather have a pair of skates and a box of tools, or something else that he can use, to articles of greater cost. Parents who give their children shoes and clothing on Christmas, the children being all the time aware that they would be clothed in Christmas never came, defeat their own ends. The essence of a Christmas gift should be fitness to the recipient, and its keynote simplicity.

The New King of Norway and the Queen Consort, and Son

ON November 20th the throne of Norway was tendered to Prince Charles of Denmark, by a deputation of members of the Norwegian Parliament. It was accepted by King Christian in behalf of his grandson. The whole function, simple yet very impressive, lasted but about twenty minutes. The brilliant ceremony was attended by princes and princesses, with their suites, and the diplomatic corps, including the American Minister, Mr. O'Brien. President Berner, in a five-minute speech, tendered the invitation to Prince Charles to become Norway's ruler, and King Christian, with similar brevity, accepted. The old King was much affected as he blessed and embraced his grandchildren, now to be known to their people as King Haakon and Queen Maud. King Christian concluded his speech to the new King and Queen with these words: "Go with God, my dear grandchildren, from the land and race that love you, to the land and people which have called you, and take the blessing with you of your old King, for you, your race and your deeds now and forever. Herewith I commend you to God."

Books make charming Christmas gifts and they are to be found in costly or in simple bindings, at prices to suit every purse. Those of us who resemble the wise virgins in the parable, began some weeks ago to lay aside as we had opportunity, gifts for our little friends and our older ones, and we took the opportunity to choose our elegant volume, or our collection of fairy tales, our table linen, cutglass, or silver, before the Christmas rush. During the weeks that lead up to Christmas, the streets are thronged with good-humored crowds, and an air of universal gaiety and comradeship prevails. Christmas is coming! The thought of it is in the air. The look of it is in the faces of the people you meet. The zest of it is in the dancing feet of the children. Christmas is coming! The North wind sounds its bugles to herald Santa Claus. The birds have all gone South, but we do not need them; for the birds of love, and hope, and cheer are singing in our hearts.

The Hat that Goes to Church

The hat that goes to church should not be a picture hat. It should not be so profusely trimmed that it will interfere with the sight of the preacher, and intercept the view of the people who sit behind you. It is perhaps too much to hope that women will ever take off their hats in church.

A traditional reverence inclines many of us to the belief that it would not be quite right to sit uncovered in the pew, but one of these days before the millennium, let us trust that all matrons will adopt for church a close fitting little bonnet, such as our beautiful Quaker sisters find convenient and agreeable, and that all girls will, for the same purpose, wear a little toque, or a very plain sailor hat. The congregation might not resemble a field of poppies, or a garden in full bloom, were this change to become the fashion, but it would be easier for the people in general to fix their minds on the service and the sermon, and everybody could look at the minister without the difficulty that is conspicuous at present.

The hat that goes to church should be a modest hat, that is not begging anybody to look at it. There are other occasions when elegant millinery is the proper thing, but the worshiping assembly is not the place to air one's vanity, or advertise one's milliner.

1906 Our "Home-Coming of The Bride" Calendar Free

OUR Calendar for the Coming Year constitutes one of the Most Delightful Surprises we have ever had In Store for the Readers of The Christian Herald.

The Scene is Laid in the South during the Colonial Times. The Whole Household is gathered on and Around the Veranda of a Typical Southern Mansion to Welcome, in Joyous Manner, the Happy Bride, Who, Leaning on the Arm of Her Stalwart Young Husband, is About to Receive the Embrace of Parents and Kindred Dear. Her Steps are Stayed by the Baby of the Family, Who Presents Her with a Bouquet of Fragrant Roses.

Greatly Reduced Reproduction of our New Twelve-Color Calendar
Just Cover the Dates, and Note how Splendidly the Picture is Adapted for Framing

While she stoops to Receive the Gift, a Smile of Grateful Appreciation Lightens up her Beautiful Face. The Groom meanwhile, still at the side of the Bride, is Responding to hearty Words of Welcome and Congratulation by cordially Waving his Hat. Neighbors and Servants, and even the Dog, are on hand to Enthusiastically Join in the Jollification of the Occasion.

This Magnificent Picture was Painted Specially for The Christian Herald by Harry A. Ogden, who enjoys the Distinction of being the Most Noted Living Painter of Colonial Scenes. It is Charmingly Reproduced in 12 Colors and supplied with Durable Hangers, ready for the Wall. It Measures 18x20 inches.

Mr. Ogden's Pictures reproduced in plain black, sell for $10.00 each, and here is a most beautiful picture in Twelve Colors, by the same artist, which, if framed, will equal in artistic value any ever produced by him. Do Not Miss This Great Picture. It has been Specially Arranged for Framing; simply Detach the Calendar, and you have a Veritable Prize. For The Christian Herald, with Calendar, Send Only $1.50. This Genuine Work of Art goes Absolutely FREE with Every Annual Subscription to The Christian Herald.

A Book Brimful of Life and Inspiration

DR. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, whose Notable Books may be Found in Nearly Every American Library, has Given us, in the Magnificent Volume Pictorially Presented on this Page, a Book that will be Read with Pleasure and Profit by Old and Young, and Prove to Tens of Thousands an Inspiration to Emulate the Grand, Glorious and Heroic Achievements which have Won Everlasting Fame for America's Distinguished Daughters and Sons. The Ancients told the History of their Great Ones in Marble and Song, but Dr. Banks has given us in this One Volume, a Garland of Stories about Columbia's Greatest Men and Women that will Fascinate Old and Young—Delighting the Former and Inspiring the Latter to Higher and Nobler Aims and to Lives of Heroism and Patriotism.

Over 80 Portraits

550 Pages

DR. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS

In his Preface to this Charming Volume, Dr. Banks says:

"BIOGRAPHY, where the real personality is revealed, is ever the most entertaining and instructive of all literature. This is a book of biography at magnetic points. It is full of the warm, red blood of very live men and women.

"It has been the purpose of the author to gather in this volume such stories of love, heroism, and adventurous daring, together with lighter incident, as would make the personalities of the people discussed, alive and real to the reader. More than half of those whose names are disclosed in this table of contents are yet living among us, and the rest still live in these stories of a vital personal career which make them immortal.

"The author has not attempted, in compiling this volume, to make it exhaustive. Another volume might be made like it, with different names, and another, and another, so rich is American history and American life in strong and vigorous and heroic personality. But he has sought to give the reader a rich mine of striking, virile stories of picturesque interest and variety, into which it would always be a pleasure to delve, either for entertainment, or to find golden nuggets for use.

* * *

"Whatever may be the judgment of the readers as to the wisdom of the selections, in the midst of such embarrassment of resources, the author feels that the book will at least have one great merit—it will be interesting, and no one will be able to spend an hour with it without his wits being brightened, and his heart stirred by communion with genuine and attractive people."

A Magnificent Volume of Life, Love and Adventure

THIS Absorbingly Interesting Book is a Veritable Treasure-House of Short Stories, Brimful of tense Human Interest and Healthful Sentiment. he Heroic, the Pathetic, the Tragic and the Startling e all well Represented; while the Amusing, the ntertaining and the Elevating, generously abound hroughout This Beautiful and Helpful Volume. Its Vealth of Anecdote, Humorous and Pathetic, but always Bright and Sparkling, will cause it to be Read and Re-read until Wear and Tear shall have Rendered its Pages Practically illegible.

This Matchless Work contains 550 Pages, Embellished with Over 80 Portraits of Men and Women Notable in American History, and Beautifully Bound in Patriotic Colors and Gold. The Cloth Used is of Exceptionally High Quality. The Book is Superbly Printed on Featherweight Paper of Extra Fine Quality.

It is Sent, All Charges Prepaid, with The Christian Herald, for One Whole Year, Including Our Superb "Home-Coming of The Bride" Calendar, on Receipt of Only Two Dollars. Money Refunded if not pleased.

St. John 5

miracle that Jesus did, when he was come out of Judea into Galilee.

Chapter 5

AFTER this there was a feast of the Jews; and Jesus went up to Jerusalem.

2 ¶ Now there is at Jerusalem by the sheep market a pool, which is called in the Hebrew tongue Bethesda, having five porches.

3 In these lay a great multitude of impotent folk, of blind, halt, withered, waiting for the moving of the water.

4 For an angel went down at a certain season into the pool, and troubled the water: whosoever then first after the troubling of the water stepped in was made whole of whatsoever disease he had.

5 And a certain man was there, which had an infirmity thirty and eight years.

6 When Jesus saw him lie, and knew that he had been now a long time in that case, he saith unto him, Wilt thou be made whole?

7 The impotent man answered him, Sir, I have no man, when the water is troubled, to put me into the pool: but while I am coming, another steppeth down before me.

8 Jesus saith unto him, Rise, take up thy bed, and walk.

9 And immediately the man was made whole, and took up his bed, and walked: and on the same day was the sabbath.

10 ¶ The Jews therefore said unto him that was cured, It is the sabbath day: it is not lawful for thee to carry thy bed.

11 He answered them, He that made me whole, the same said unto me, Take up thy bed, and walk.

12 Then asked they him, What man is that which said unto thee, Take up thy bed, and walk?

13 And he that was healed wist not who it was: for Jesus had conveyed himself away, a multitude being in that place.

14 Afterward Jesus findeth him in the temple, and said unto him, Behold, thou art made whole: sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee.

15 The man departed, and told the Jews that it was Jesus, which had made him whole.

16 And therefore did the Jews persecute Jesus, and sought to slay him, because he had done these things on the sabbath day.

17 ¶ But Jesus answered them, My Father worketh hitherto, and I work.

18 Therefore the Jews sought the more to kill him, because he not only had broken the sabbath, but said also that God was his Father, making himself equal with God.

The Only Genuine Red Letter Bible

This edition of the Holy Scriptures is the Authorized Version, self-pronouncing and unchanged, save for the variation of the color in the type. Two colors (Red and Black) are employed, in accordance with the simple plan devised by Dr. Louis Klopsch, the Originator of the Red-Letter principle applied to the Holy Scriptures.

Plan of the RED LETTER Bible

1 In the New Testament, the words universally accepted as those of our Saviour are Printed in Red.

2 In the Old Testament, the passages printed in Red are those quoted by our Lord, or directly related to incidents to which he referred.

3 Red lettering in the Reference Column of the Old Testament directs the reader to some particular utterance of Christ, in which the corresponding quotation or allusion may be found.

4 A Red Star (★) immediately following a verse in the Old Testament, indicates that, in the concurrent opinion of scholars and theologians, the verse embodies a prophetic reference to Christ as the coming Messiah.

Our Three Editions

The Type, Printing, and Red-Lettering are Identically the Same in All Three Editions

THE CHARIOTS OF THE LORD

A Story of the days of Religious Persecution in England

BY JOSEPH HOCKING

CHAPTER I.

OH, you are there, Master Baxter. Well,. I will see to it that you are there for a purpose. Oh, you shall have justice. For that reason the most Christian of kings hath appointed me to dispense it."

A great crowd had gathered at the Guildhall, London, soon after King James II. had come to the throne, and the eyes of the people were turned alternately towards a benevolent looking divine who stood in the prisoner's dock and the judge who sat on the bench. Nearly every spectator showed signs of excitement, on many faces strong anger was expressed, yet no man dared to proclaim his anger aloud. All were cowed by the judge, who, with an angry scowl on his face and a gleam of savage joy in his eyes, scanned the faces of both prisoner and counsel.

The prisoner was Richard Baxter, an old Puritan clergyman, who had been chaplain of the Parliamentary forces during the civil war, but was everywhere beloved for his piety, his great learning, and his gracious deeds. The judge was Jeffreys, who had been favored by Charles II., and was now the trusted servant of the new King.

"Oh, you shall have justice," went on Jeffreys exultantly. "I will see to that; ah, yes, I will see to that. You wanted time to prepare your case, did you, Master Baxter? Time to bring lying witnesses, and time to bolster up their lies by pious cant? But no, not a minute. Oates or Baxter, which is the worst? If you, Master Baxter, stood on one side of the pillory and Oates on the other, the two greatest rogues in the kingdom would stand together."

Baxter only replied by a sigh, but the spectators muttered angrily.

"Silence," cried Jeffreys, looking intently at a man whose voice had been heard in protestation. "Think you I will be frightened by the snarls of curs? Oh, yes, I am marking you. I see you, you hypocritical knave, and some day I will have you before me, and then I will see what your snarls are worth. Who is here for the defence of this villain, Richard Baxter?"

At this two barristers spoke, whereupon Jeffreys went on: "Master Pollexfen, and Master Wallop, eh? Well, you have glib tongues, but you will not alter me. Now, what have you to say?"

Master Pollexfen began to speak, but he had not uttered six words before Jeffreys broke forth angrily:

"Pollexfen, I know you well. I will set a mark on you. This is an old rogue, a schismatical knave, a hypocritical villain. He hates the Liturgy. He would have nothing but long-winded cant without a book. This is how he wants to worship God. Just listen."

On this, Jeffreys sat back in his chair, turned up his eyes, clasped his hands, and began singing through his nose in most lugubrious tones: "Lord, we are thy people. Thy peculiar people. Thy dear people."

"That is how these Presbyterians would have us pray, and think you his Majesty will have it? Besides, the fellow is a traitor, a villain."

"But, my lord," said Pollexfen, "his late Majesty offered Master Baxter a bishopric, so he could not be——"

"Silence!" cried Jeffreys. "If his Majesty offered him a bishopric, why did not the old blockhead take it? Nay, is this not a sign of his evil heart? For he hath an evil heart. Ah, you Baxter, you plotting villain, you hypocritical knave, you lying blackguard. Oh, you shall have justice; I will see to that!"

"My Lord," said Baxter, "if you will allow me to speak——"

Upon this the other advocate, Master Wallop, tried to speak, but again Jeffreys interrupted:

"No, I will not let you go on," he cries. "You are in all the dirty cases, Mr. Wallop. Gentlemen of the long robe ought to be ashamed to assist such factious knaves. If you do not know your duty, I will teach you," he added testily.

At this Mr. Wallop tried to expostulate. "What!" cried Jeffreys, "you dare to answer me! Am I not appointed by his Gracious Majesty to see that knaves get their due? You would bully me, would you? I'll let you know! I'll have you all packed into gaol sooner or later," he cried in great heat.

On this the old divine arose, and began to speak.

"My lord," he said, "I have been much blamed by Dissenters for speaking respectfully of bishops."

"Ho, ho!" cried Jeffreys. "Baxter for bishops, that is a merry conceit indeed. I know very well what you mean by bishops. Factious Presbyterians."

"My lord," said Baxter, "if you will allow me to speak, I will prove——"

"Prove, prove! Ay, I doubt not," bellowed the judge, "thou wouldst prove that the devil was an angel of light, and that King James was a false knave like thee. Richard, Richard, dost thou think we will let thee poison the court? Richard, thou art an old knave. Thou hast written enough books to load a cart, and every book as full of sedition as an egg is full of meat. But by the grace of God, I will look after thee. I see a great many of your brotherhood waiting to know what will befall their mighty Don. Ay, and at your side is the pious, learned Dr. Bates. But by the grace of God Almighty I'll crush you all. Speak? No, you shall not speak. You shall have the justice of a Christian judge—not a Presbyterian hypocrite who hath been appointed by a Christian king."

At this, Richard Baxter lapsed into silence, but one of the advocates tried to show that a wrong interpretation had been put upon Baxter's words.

"You shall not turn this court into a conventicle," cried Jeffreys. "Have I not read his book, called The Paraphrase of the New Testament, and have I not said that it is full of sedition? Is not that enough? Am I to be taught my duty and the law, by men who do not know a great A from the track of a goose? I say the fellow is a knave, and hath written seditious books, and that is enough."

At this some who were in the hall fell to weeping, but this aroused Jeffreys more than ever.

"Silence, you snivelling calves," he cried. "If I hear another sound I will e'en have you whipped at a cart-tail."

"My lord," said Pollexfen, "I crave your leave to bring witnesses, who will speak as to Master Baxter's character."

"Oh, let them come, let them come," cried the judge; "they cannot deceive me. I can smell Presbyterianism in their clothes. But I am a just judge, so I will hear them."

On this many witnesses, including several clergymen of the Established Church, sought to witness as to Richard Baxter's character, but Jeffreys drowned their voices by angry shouts.

"What is the use of your saying that he is a pious, God fearing man?" he cried. "Hath he not refused the Bishopric of Hereford, offered him by that saintly King, Charles II.? Why did he refuse it? Because he was a traitor. Was he not a chaplain to the rebel army? Did he not refuse to take the Oath of Uniformity? Is he not a Dissenter, a snivelling Presbyterian? I tell you he shall suffer."

At this Richard Baxter rose to his feet again.

"My lord," he said, "do you think any jury will convict a man on such a trial as this?"

"Don't trouble yourself about that, Mr. Baxter," said Jeffreys. "I will see to it that you are convicted and that judgment shall be passed. I and my three brethren here will give you what you deserve."

The jury brought in a verdict of guilty, even as the judge had said, and as they uttered the word, Jeffreys gave a derisive laugh.

"Guilty!" he cried, "of course he's guilty. You've acted like honest Christian gentlemen. Had you dared to bring in another verdict it should have been worse for you. Now, then, for the sentence, and to show how fair I want to be, my three brethren and I will retire and consider the matter."

During the whole of the proceedings a youth had stood among the spectators, never uttering a sound, but who had missed not a word nor a look. Now and then his eyes flashed fire, and again his hand crept to his sword hilt, as though he could barely control his feelings, but, as I have said, he continued throughout the trial without uttering a sound.

He appeared to be between nineteen and twenty years of age. He might have been more than that, for although a moustache had only just begun to dawn on his upper lip, his form

THE CHRISTMAS GOSPEL

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

MALACHI lived at a time when God was recreating the Jewish people. They had just returned from their seventy years of captivity. They were not well established in right ways of dealing with each other and with God. They were not just with each other, but oppressed the hirelings, and the widows and the fatherless children. Even with God they dealt meanly, bringing for sacrifice animals that were lame and blind and sick, keeping the best for themselves. They had also kept back a part of the money which they had promised for the Temple services. God sent Malachi to teach them better.

Malachi knew that they had seen silversmiths draw off the impurities from the molten mass, until it was so pure and bright that they could see their faces reflected in it. And so Malachi said to the people in substance: "Just so does God wish to see himself in all you say and do, and for this reason he has been chastening you." It was then that Malachi told them of a time not far off, when Jesus should come as a great light, as the Sun of righteousness. The Old Testament light was as the cosmic light God made on the first day of creation. Jesus was to be like the brighter, warmer, quickening sun that God made on the fourth day. Many people were turned from their wicked ways by the words of Malachi. Perhaps these were the people who asked Ezra to read the Law of God to them. The world was being prepared for Jesus to come and reign in the hearts of men. Malachi was the last prophet sent by God until John the Baptist came crying, "Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight."

Illustration and Application

It was said of a certain orator, that no other man could blend sunshine and lightning as he did. Our lesson presents the sunshine and lightning of the Gospel. Not "Sweetness and light," but sweetness and fire were to be combined in the expected Messiah. As both were in Christ, both should be in every Christian.

1. Christ will come to the wicked as a fire. Through all the prophets there were two threads of thought: rebukes of present sin, promises of a coming Saviour. But because there is sin, the Saviour is to be a purging fire to those who will receive him, a consuming fire to those who will not. Malachi's book divides into three sections, in the first of which (from 1: 6 to 2: 9) he rebukes the unfaithful priests; in the second (2:9-16), those who have married heathen wives; in the third (from 2: 17 to 4:6), all the people, warning them of judgment to come, and promising a Saviour. The Messiah, he tells them, will be both a purging fire and a healing Sun. He is to be a refiner. As a silversmith sits beside the crucible, looking with careful gaze upon the molten metal before him, observant that it shall not be left too crude or unmelted, but still more cautious lest in the severity of the fire it shall be burned, and watching for that intense moment when his own face shall be reflected in the now glittering mass—so the Christ of God is pictured as sitting as a refiner of our chastened souls, in which he waits to see his own image at last reflected.

When Christ came, he proved to be as Malachi had promised, at once severe and tender, fire and sun. The two-edged sword John saw in his mouth (Rev. 1: 16), we may see more clearly in the twenty-third and twenty-fifth chapters of Matthew, the severest chapters ever spoken or written, promising woe to the hypocrites and punishment to the persistently wicked (25: 46); but in the midst of these woes, Jesus tenderly cries to sinful Jerusalem: "How often I would have gathered you as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wing, and ye would not (23: 37). What a phrase is that of the beloved disciple, "the wrath of the Lamb!" The justice of mercy! The severity of gentleness! Those who present Christ as too loving to punish, understand neither God nor goodness, both of which have a side of severity. In this soft age, when so many characters lack the "blood and iron" of righteous indignation at sin, it is well to have such a lesson as this, even in the approach to Christmas, that we may not forget that to Christ sin is exceedingly sinful, and that in the Christmas message there is "no peace to the wicked," but, as the Revision shows, peace only "among those in whom God is well pleased." John the Baptist, the promised "messenger," who has been called "the clasp of the two testaments," prepared the way of the Lord by manifesting in his own life and work the combined sweetness and fire that was to be in the greater "Messenger of the covenant"—the Messiah himself. And thus may every one of us prepare the way for Christ, by displaying in our lives Christlike justice as well as mercy, Christlike courage as well as tenderness.

Those against whom Christ bears witness are sorcerers, adulterers, perjurers, employers who defraud their employees of their just wages, those who cheat the widow and the fatherless, and the ignorant alien, and those who rob God of the reverence and revenue due to him. God required sacrifices of choicest quality, such as the perfect lamb or ox. But the backslidden Jews of Malachi's day brought animals sick and lame—poor in quality, as well as inadequate in quantity (Mal. 1: 8). "Present it now unto thy Governor," cried Malachi; which was, as if a preacher to-day, when a well-dressed audience on Sunday night sends up to the pulpit plates full of pennies, should say: "Imagine this a political meeting, and such an offering as this made to prosecute a political campaign! Shall we not give for saving souls as generous contributions as for winning votes?"

A little boy, living in the most poverty-stricken section of a great city, found his way into a mission Sunday School and became a Christian. One day, not long after, someone tried to shake the child's faith by asking him some puzzling questions: "If God really loves you, why doesn't he take better care of you? Why doesn't he tell somebody to send you a pair of shoes, or else coal enough so that you can keep warm this winter?" The boy thought a moment and then said, as the tears rushed to his eyes: "I guess he does tell somebody, and somebody forgets."

"The Lord whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to his Temple" (Mal. 3: 1)

The plague of gold strikes far and near,
And deep and strong it enters:
The purple chimar which we wear
Makes madder than the centaur's;
Our thoughts grow blank, our words grow strange,
We cheer the pale gold diggers:
Each soul is worth so much on 'Change,
And marked, like sheep, in figures,
Be pitiful, O God. MRS. BROWNING.

Bring to God and man all the forgotten tithes and God will open the windows of heaven and pour you out a blessing. The jaded sons of wealth, bored with ennui because they have sated selfishness, might, by turning their minds and hands to organizing wise philanthropy, taste new sweets in the luxury of doing good.

This bringing in of the tithes means repentance and restitution to God. In Wales, the recent revivals has in no other way proved its genuineness more strikingly than in the payment of many long neglected debts, that grocers and others had marked "N. G." and considered as lost as other stolen goods.

In Leyton, England, there was a village blacksmith called "The Nabob," famous for his great strength and hot temper. He had quarrelled much with Elijah Mee, his next door neighbor, a hard drinker and gambler, who retaliated in many ingenious ways, of which he was won't to boast in his cups at the Red Lion Inn. Elijah went away and came back a changed man, in good clothes, a teetotaler and a Christian. He called on "The Nabob" and said, "Good day, Mr. Stone, I've come to ask pardon for many a bad turn I've done you. Will you shake hands and tell me you forgive me?" "Never, never," said "The Nabob." "I don't wonder you're angered, but I've come to make restitution." And with that he pulled out two sovereigns. "What is that for?" said "The Nabob," astonished. "Some of it is for fencing," said Elijah, "and some for vegetables I killed by syringing them with poison." "Well," said "The Nabob," they told me you were a new man and I begin to believe it," and taking the gold, he shook hands cordially. Years afterwards Elijah had the joy of leading to Christ his old enemy, who began on that day of restitution to believe there must be something in religion.

2. Christ Coming to the Penitent as the Healing Sun of Righteousness (Mal. 4: 2). Wrath and mercy are set side by side in that last chapter of Malachi, whose whole book is really our lesson. "Behold the day cometh, it shall burn as a furnace, when all the proud, and all that work wickedness shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up . . . but unto you that fear my name shall the sun of righteousness arise with healing in its wings."

At a village school in England, examination day had come. Among other questions the examiner asked, "Is there anything that God cannot see?" "No, sir," they all cried. All? No, not all. When the others were silent little Teddy held up his hand. "Well, my boy, what do you want to say? Is there anything that God cannot see?" "Yes, please sir." The examiner turned with a vexed expression to the teacher. "There, Miss Brown! I said the child would only be a disgrace if he was examined with the others. The boy is perfectly stupid." The teacher flushed and looked sad; she loved the little fellow, and had taken pains with him. But Teddy did not sit down; he stood there, his little face quivering. "Please, sir," he said, "he can't see my sins, because they are all blotted out by the blood of Jesus." The teacher's eyes grew suddenly dim, and the examiner coughed as if he felt a lump in his throat. Teddy was right after all.

A Christian life is sunshine—that is the plain meaning of the words of Malachi. Let us make them true in our own lives. Memnon's statue, the legend is, gave out melody at the touch of morning sunbeams. Let our souls so respond in the new song to the sunshine of Christ's love. And let us reflect the sunshine on, and so awaken music in other souls. I have read the account of a long, rainy afternoon, at the end of which the sun came out brightly; and of a dog, who straightway moved from his place in the shadow to a spot where the delayed sunshine was the brightest. Surely the Christian will find sunshine and bask in it, even in the cloudy and dark day.

Especially should we let the sunlight of Christ radiate our common labor with the thought that whatever we do may be done for the glory of God and the good of men. In the archivolt of the central door of St. Mark's at Venice, the fourteen arts and trades by which the Venetians lived are represented in lively sculpture. The keystone of the arch is Christ. Work is not a curse.

Malachi is mostly occupied with warnings to flee from the wrath to come, the neglect of which is even more fatal than was the neglect of many Chinese boats outside the harbor of Hong Kong to heed the typhoon signal when it was raised in an unusual season.

"Nonsense," they cried; "we never have typhoons at this time of year! We will not be so foolish as to go into harbor." Perhaps some anxious mothers, as they watched their little ones playing about said, "It would be best to go into refuge. It may be a storm will come." But they were only ridiculed for their fears, and still the solemn warning signal showed dark against the sky. Suddenly—swiftly—the typhoon swept upon them. Too late! Longing eyes turned to the harbor where they might have found shelter long ago. Now there was no hope; the seething waves tossed and shattered the boats—the homes of hundreds—and sucked them under as if with a roar of triumph. Many were drowned that day—and all through their own unbelief. The warning was faithfully given, but they laughed it to scorn.

Dr. O'Hanlon's Question Box

A Novel Spiritual Feature at the Bowery Mission — Some of the Interrogatories

A NEW and valuable feature of the spiritual work of the Bowery Mission is the "Bible Class Question Box," conducted by the Rev. Thomas O'Hanlon, D.D., which has been established within the last few weeks. For many years past Dr. O'Hanlon has conducted the famous Summer Bible Class at Ocean Grove, which is believed to be the largest in the world. In some respects, it is also the most unique, being interdenominational and cosmopolitan. Like it, the Bowery Mission Class is cosmopolitan in the last degree, since all nations and races are represented in the great East Side of New York. Like it, too, it is sectarian, and knows no denominational lines, but aims to help inquiring souls, wherever they may be found.

In conducting the Bowery Mission Question Box, Dr. O'Hanlon invites questions from any person in the audience. These often deal with a great variety of subjects; but it is expected that, as a rule, they should be confined, as far as possible, to Biblical matters and to questions of spiritual experience, though latitude is frequently allowed where the question is of a helpful nature.

Below are some of the questions propounded to Dr. O'Hanlon at the last meeting, together with his answers. They will be found most interesting and instructive reading, and as many will doubtless enjoy them, we shall continue to print weekly the leading questions and answers of every session of this Bible Interrogation Class. Any reader, who may feel prompted to put a question to Dr. O'Hanlon, may address him, care of the Bowery Mission, 55 Bowery, New York.

1 What is meant by "a new creature in Christ Jesus?" Does it mean an instantaneous change, or a gradual growth Christward?

IT means a new creation in our spiritual nature (II. Cor. 5: 17; Gal. 6: 15; John 3: 3-8) always instantaneous. But the consciousness of it in some cases, comes gradually as the increasing light of the morning precedes the sunrise (Prov. 4: 18). It is a matter of heartfelt experience full of religious joy and a divine love for God and man.

2 How can we know that we have received the baptism of the Holy Spirit? Paul asked the disciples at Ephesus if they had received the Holy Ghost since they had believed, proving that this does not always come at conversion. Acts 8: 14, 15, 16 tell us, that when the Apostles which were at Jerusalem, heard that Samaria had received the Word of God, they sent unto them Peter and John, who, when they were come down, prayed for them, that they might receive the Holy Ghost.

YOU must know it by experience, by your own consciousness you will feel sure that it is so. The disciples at Ephesus at this time, knew only of the baptism of John the Baptist; they knew nothing of Christ's baptism of the Holy Ghost. The disciples at Samaria had already been baptized in the name of Christ for the graces of the Holy Spirit, promised to all Christians in their religious experience; but they had not been baptized for the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit as in this case, and as confined to the Apostolic Age.

3 Is confession of Christ necessary to salvation?

YES. Matt. 10: 32; Luke 12: 8, 9; Romans 10: 9, 10; I. John 1: 9, 4: 15.

4 What is the reason I lose courage and control of myself in speaking? When I stand up I am unable to say what I intended.

IT is stage fright—your first experience in public speaking. A full heart will greatly help you, for "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." Persist in giving your testimony for Christ, if it is only a few words from your heart; it will greatly strengthen you and benefit others.

5 Is there any hope beyond the grave for one who dies impenitent?

THE Scriptures give no hope whatever; but, on the contrary, warns us to prepare, in this life, for death and the judgment, and to do it immediately. (Mark 8: 36, 37; Heb. 2: 3.)

6 Is Jonathan Edwards' sermon on "Sinners in the hands of an angry God," a true presentation of Gospel truth?

JONATHAN EDWARDS in that historic sermon, portrays future punishment under the strong figure of actual fire, as our Lord himself does (Mark 9: 44, 46, 48). In the next world we shall have spiritual bodies incapable of suffering by literal fire, and not material bodies. Remorse and the loss of all hope will be the worm that dieth not, and the fire that is not quenched.

7 Does God expect you to forgive a man who has wronged you, and is still wronging you?

"IF thy brother trespass against thee, rebuke him; and if he repent, forgive him. And if he trespass against thee seven times in a day, and seven times in a day turn again to thee, saying, I repent; thou shalt forgive him" (Luke 17: 3, 4).

8 I am trying to lead a Christian life. Why do so many things worry me, that previously were no trial? Is it God who is trying me, or is it Satan?

ALL beginnings are difficult, and some are very difficult. Strive to enter in at the strait gate. You are turning away from the old life to the new and better life; from the old associates and bad habits to new ones; but of the new life you will soon find that, "Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace" (Prov. 3: 17). God tempteth no man (James 1: 13, 14). But your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion walketh about, seeking whom he may devour (I. Peter 5: 8, 9).

A Book that Greatly Pleases

I think "Capital Stories About Famous Americans" is rightly named. I am very much pleased with it. It renews our patriotism and makes us proud of our country, and the legacy our ancestors left us. I wish to thank you for it.

There are a Hundred Imitations.

Is there more than one kind of Ivory Soap?

No; but there are a hundred imitations. A dishonest grocer will give you one of these and say: "This is Ivory," or "This is just as good."

Do not accept it unless it is stamped Ivory. The shape of the cake and the appearance of the wrapper may be similar, but the name can not be used on any but the genuine.

There is no "free" uncombined alkali in Ivory Soap. That is why it will not injure the finest fabric or the most delicate skin.

Dr. Ridpath is dead, his work is done, but his family derive an income from his History, and to print our price broadcast for the sake of more quickly selling these few sets, would cause great injury to future sales.

The reason for Dr Ridpath's enviable position as an historian is his wonderfully beautiful style, a style no other historian has ever equaled. He pictures the great historical events as though they were happening before your eyes; he carries you with him to see the battles of old; to meet kings and queens and warriors; to sit in the Roman Senate; to march against Saladin and his dark-skinned followers; to sail the southern seas with Drake; to circumnavigate the globe with Magellan; to watch the clash of Greek spearmen work havoc with the Persian hordes on the field of Marathon; to know Napoleon as you know Roosevelt. He combines pleasing interest with supreme reliability, and makes the heroes of history real, living men and women, and about them he weaves the rise and fall of empires in such a fascinating style that history becomes intensely interesting. 20,000 Americans own and love Ridpath.

Hundreds who read this have decided to buy Ridpath some day; now is the time. The English speaking world has pronounced this the only history of the world worth having. SEND COUPON TO-DAY.

hold school for the children, and in order that they may learn that there are other people living on this vast globe besides themselves, we teach them a little geography, besides elementary rules of arithmetic, and a little astronomy. Practically all can read their Bibles and use their hymn-books, and write a letter now and then to their missionary.

The services are cheerful and well attended. On festive and high days a choir of Eskimo men and women adds a charm to the meetings. The singing is pleasing, and earnest attention is paid to the discourse. After a meeting, some one of the hearers may come to the missionary for further explanation. Now and then we are privileged to see the sudden change that God's Spirit works in the human heart.

Peace and order are not upheld here by the arm of government or law, but solely by the influence of the Gospel. We have no judges, no police, and yet thefts, outrages and felonies are practically unknown. The missionary is all in all to the native, and although he has no power to say "you must," yet his wish is duly considered and seldom trespassed.

We often feel that these winter months of toil and labor for the Master are all too brief, and our hearts are sad when our flock disperses again after Easter to the hunting-grounds. True, they make the mission station their centre, and call frequently, in order to get advice and help, and to attend services ; but we feel keenly that sometimes, especially with our younger members, these months of absence seem to undo what was built up during the long winter. CHR. SCHMITT.

AN IDOL DESTROYED

FROM a letter lately received by Mr. John C. Havemeyer, of Yonkers, N. Y., from a missionary in Almora, Upper Province, India, we are privileged to give the following interesting extracts:

"About a year ago, we wrote concerning the severe spiritual battles in which we have been engaged since settling in this part of the country, where the devil is worshiped by name, and honored as King of kings, his throne in this place never before having been assailed by the children of the true God. . . . An old idol temple is located at the top of a mountain on this estate, containing a stone idol, which had been worshiped for centuries by the people of this immediate neighborhood. I promised God that at any cost, live or die, I would obey him and destroy the temple and its idol. My workers all agreeing with me, we proceeded at once to the spot, and, with large hammers, completely demolished the whole thing. The devil raged. The people ran to the villages to gather a mob together to kill us. Some of the more prudent ones, however, persuaded the people to be quiet and do the missionaries no harm, 'since,' they said, 'the Big God had ordered them to do it,' at the same time telling the people that if the idol was a god, he would bring a curse upon the missionaries, that they might even die. Months have passed and they have patiently watched the outcome. Our God has been with us, preserving and blessing us, while the judgment of God has been upon them in death and in the destruction of their crops.

"After this, some of the people began to inquire the way to the missionaries' God, others doing all in their power to prevent the inquirers from finding Jesus. On one occasion, after a man had declared the Christian's God to be his, breaking his caste and eating our food, a band of men gathered around him and said they would kill him. The next day the leader of the band went out into his field to plough, a storm came up suddenly, and before he could reach his house he was pelted to death by the large hailstones beating out his brains. His cattle also were killed. This incident greatly awed some of the people, while others became threatening and vicious in their attitude toward us. Later, we discovered they had stolen our grain and were bent upon doing us all the injury of which they were capable. We called in a few of the men to question them regarding the theft, upon which they became angry and at once hurried to their villages, reporting that the missionaries were attempting to make them Christians at the point of the gun, and with a knife held over their heads in threat.

"This resulted in a mob of one hundred men congregating within three hundred yards of our house, declaring they would be rid of the missionaries by taking their lives. The government sent officials and police over forty miles, to aid us, who camped nearly two weeks on our place. When we discovered of what a serious offense the men were guilty in their forming into an unlawful assembly for the purpose of doing us bodily harm, and that the penalty for such meant from three to ten years' imprisonment, sister K——, brother P——, and myself, saddled our ponies and started for the Deputy Commissioner's, with the purpose of interceding for the men who were bent on doing us injury. We returned, rejoicing to know that the people whom we had learned to love would escape punishment, and that we had had another opportunity of proving our love to them. They all confessed their guilt, asked forgiveness, and signed a peace bond. The official departed, after begging our prayers and assuring us of his friendship and support.

"We hear it rumored that the Brahmans are determined, if possible, to get us out of the country, as it appears to them that all the people will soon become Christians, the consequence being that the Brahmans will have to do their own ploughing, a thing never heard of before.

"Thousands of heathen are watching this fight and are ready to take their stand on the victorious side. We praise God for what we see by the eye of faith, namely, the greatest victory of all our Christian experience. Pray for us!"

A BUSINESS FRIEND
To be Counted on Under all Circumstances.

One of the bright business women of New York city who found that coffee was wrecking her nervous system, bringing on severe neuralgic attacks and making her "extremely irritable," writes that she has found a staunch friend in Postum Food Coffee:

"I left off the old kind of coffee completely and entirely. This I found was easy to do, since Postum was pleasing to my palate from the beginning. Indeed all my family are with me thinking it delicious when it is properly prepared—and by that I mean boiled long enough.

"I have not had one single attack of neuralgia since I began to drink Postum some months ago, my nerves have become steady and the old annoying irritability has, thank God, passed away. I cannot withhold this acknowledgment which is made in all sincere gratitude." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There's a reason. Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

The Present Distress in London

THERE is an unusual amount of suffering in London this season, owing to the fact that thousands of laborers, lately employed on the Embankment, are idle. Recently 6,000 women, the wives of unemployed laborers, assembled on the Embankment, and marched to the Local Government Board offices, Whitehall, where Mr. Balfour, the President, received a deputation of thirty, introduced by Mr. Will Crooks, the member of Parliament for Woolwich, whose wife was a prominent figure in the procession. Mrs. Crooks told Mr. Balfour about the destitution in her district, and invited him to "come to us for a fortnight" to see for himself. Mr. Balfour's reply was not very encouraging. He said that the Government fully recognized the reality and the gravity of the evils complained of. After defending the Unemployed Act and the regulations for its administration, he expressed doubt whether Parliament was well adapted for meeting urgent public needs as they arose. He then dealt with the socialistic suggestions made by some of the speakers, and said that the statement that there was an unlimited amount of land in the country which could be profitably worked by the unemployed town-dwellers was a dangerous delusion. He hoped that the Unemployed Act, aided by public spirit and generosity, would at least do something to mitigate the existing distress.

March of the Wives of the Unemployed in London

The procession through the streets of the English metropolis was a humiliating spectacle. It was duplicated a few days later, when 10,000 unemployed men marched through the West End to Hyde Park, singing the "Marseillaise."

Answered Prayers

PRAYER

I KNOW not by what methods rare,
But this I know—God answers prayer.
I know not when he sends the word
That tells us fervent prayer is heard.
I know it cometh soon or late.

Therefore, we need to pray and wait.
I know not if the blessing sought
Will come in just the guise I thought.
I leave my prayers with Him alone
Whose will is wiser than my own.

A Believer, Iowa. "I have great faith in prayer; have had many prayers answered."

Mrs. S. A. M. S. C. "I was in deep trouble. I prayed earnestly and the Lord answered me."

M. A. G., Massachusetts. "I have been encouraged so much by the 'Answered Prayers' column, that I wish to add my testimony and give thanks to God for his aid."

N. E. N., Ontario. "I prayed to the Lord for a great blessing when all earthly help failed. My prayer was answered."

Mrs. M. M. W., Tennessee. "I was in great trouble and prayed to the Lord. This prayer and many others he has answered in far better ways than I could have asked."

W. R. J., Michigan. "When I am in trouble I take it to the Lord in prayer, and he has never failed me. When sorrow like sea billows roll, I find refuge in Christ Jesus in prayer."

Reader, Connecticut. "I am much interested in the 'Answered Prayers' column. I am praying for relief from a great trial. I shall always believe in God's way, if I cannot see it clearly."

John M. N., New York. "I desire to express my thanksgiving to my Heavenly Father for his goodness to me. I cast my burden on the Lord, and he not only sustained me, but relieved me of the load."

N. S. M., Michigan. "I have been much interested and helped by reading the 'Answered Prayers' column. I often feel like exclaiming, it is just Jesus, and I want to add that I have had many answers."

Mrs. A. M. McLaren, Brooklyn, N. Y., wants to acknowledge God's goodness to her:

"Not what we wish, but what we want,
O let thy grace supply.
The good unasked, in mercy grant,
The ill, though asked, deny."

Mrs. R. H. M. "There are so many women who cannot live in the atmosphere of prayer and continual rejoicing in the contemplation of heavenly things as Mary, but, like Martha, just have to minister to the daily needs of family life, and the many little domestic worries dim the faith that should always prevail, and then to read of or experience our Heavenly Father's direct and personal blessing, is a great uplift."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from Mrs. Thomas P., Coal Bluff, Pa.; E. F. M., Nebraska; Mrs. M. J. F., Athens, Ala.; Mrs. N. M., Lancaster, Pa.; J. L. P., Milan, Ill.; Mema E., Wilbur, Wash.; Mrs. R. J. D., Norwalk, Calif.; S. R. M., Ohio; Mrs. C. O. M., Drane, Pa.; Mrs. L. M. H., Spokane, Wash.; B. J. O., Camden, N. Y.; Mrs. G. H. Z., Illinois; A Subscriber, Kentucky; E. C. K., Nashua, N. H.

way, each Settlement would bring into employment every year the best talent of the Mission.

At the Station above mentioned, about the time the Settlement was commenced, famine had visited the country, and the missionaries were impelled by the distress to open a large orphanage for the neglected and orphan children.

Providence raised up friends to these children in the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and in Dr. Klopsch, and the Orphanage was, with their consent, placed under the patronage of CHRISTIAN HERALD donors. A large number of the children rescued here and brought under Christian influences, have been converted. Many have already attained to some of the higher classes of education, and many more are learning useful occupations, whereby they will be able very soon to earn a good living. In this way, both the demand and supply for Christian workers, in spiritual and secular things, grew up around us at the same time. E. BULLARD.

In a letter from Mrs. S. K. Silliman, a missionary at Nanarampet, Guntur District, the writer incloses a very interesting and picturesque photographic group of orphans, which appears on the cover page of this issue. The woman in the picture is the matron of the girls' school, and a most capable Christian worker. These orphans, like over five thousand others distributed throughout the various Missions of India, are supported by patrons through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. "A short time ago," Mrs. Silliman writes, "we had the joy of seeing seven of these orphans follow Christ in baptism."

Skilful use of knitting needle and crochet hook will save dollars and make a woman the proud owner of garments and innumerable other articles which cannot be bought at stores. Sweaters, shawls, petticoats, breakfast jackets, afghans, etc., are a necessity during the winter months—besides they are in high fashion now. Nimble fingers can fashion these feminine accessories in a short time.

In planning a garment, it is important to remember that to produce satisfactory results only the best yarns should be used.

The "Fleisher" Yarns combine all the qualities required by the expert knitter or crocheter—evenness, elasticity, loftiness. They are dyed in a full line of beautiful colors, from the deep rich shades used for afghans, to the delicate tints for children's garments.

If you use The "Fleisher" Yarns, you can be sure that the working will be a pleasure and that the garment will stand the test of wash and wear.

The Chariots of the Lord

was tall and muscular, giving evidence of more matured strength than was to be expected of a youth in his teens. He was richly attired in the fashion of the time, and appeared to be a man of good family. His sword-hilt was bejeweled, and his velvet cloak bore evidence of wealth. His skin was somewhat dark, his eyes and hair were jet black, and there was, in spite of his youth, a bold, determined look on his face.

Some who were near him noted the tremble of his lips, and the flash of his eyes during the trial, and wondered who the gay court gallant might be, who appeared to sympathize so deeply with the old divine who had suffered so shamefully.

While the judges were discussing the verdict, there was much conversation in the court, for the departure of Jeffreys seemed to be hailed by the people even as pure air and sunlight might be hailed by those who had dwelt in a dungeon. One of the men who had been watching the youth therefore tried to obtain speech with him.

"There seems to be no justice in England now, young master," he said. "Is it not so?"

The young man looked towards his questioner, but vouchsafed no reply.

"I tell you the Lord will have his vengeance one of these days. Sorrow may endure for the night, but joy cometh in the morning."

The youth shrugged his shoulders, French fashion.

"The Lord!" he said, "what doth the Lord care? The devil is allowed to do his work, and the Lord taketh no heed!"

"Ay, speak not so. Another Oliver Cromwell may arise, even as Josiah arose of olden time."

"Hush," said a voice near. "There be spies everywhere. Speak not of Oliver in so loud a voice."

"Ay, but the Lord is not dead."

"If we trusted in ourselves a little more, it may be we should please God the better," said the youth.

"Say not so. Say not so. But perchance you have suffered also, young man. Perchance the Lord has caused you to be like Daniel of olden time, and you have dared to hold to your faith in God, even in the court of a Babylonish king."

The youth looked at him angrily, and then turned away his head. The other made several other attempts to enter into conversation with him, but he seemed vexed with himself for having said so much.

Meanwhile Jeffreys consulted with his brother judges as to the fate of Richard Baxter.

"I tell you what must be done," he cried. "The fellow must be tied to a cart's tail and whipped through London streets. This hath befallen Oates, and this meddling, prating Presbyterian is as bad as he."

"Nay," cried the others, "even the King would not consent to that."

"King! I'll answer for the King!" cried Jeffreys. "The King knows me, and trusts me. That is why I am what I am. Nothing would please his Majesty better than that this seditious rascal should be made an example of. I tell you, King James would rejoice to hear him crying for mercy."

"It would mean a riot," the others urged.

"Riot! I would love to see it. It would rejoice me to mete out justice to the rioters. By our holy religion, I would make every man in England shudder at the thought of riot."

"But I tell you this cannot be. A fine now——"

"A fine! No, God helping me, there shall be no fine. If there is, it shall be an impossible one. Yes, a fine of a thousand marks, which if he cannot pay without delay, he be whipped and sent to prison for five years."

But this the others, in spite of Jeffreys' persistence, would not agree to. Moreover, one of his brethren, although his inferior in rank as Justice, was nevertheless one of whom Jeffreys was afraid, and as a consequence yielded to his desires.

A deadly silence prevailed in the court as the judges again resumed their seats. For some minutes Jeffreys did not speak. Instead, he gazed around the court, his cruel, evil-looking eyes making many to shudder as they rested on them. Evidently he desired to make the people dread his power.

"Silence," said Jeffreys at length, as though he would add terror to his words; for, indeed, there was no need to command silence, seeing that every one waited breathlessly for the verdict.

"Richard Baxter," said Jeffreys, "it has been proved here to-day, in spite of lying witnesses and bullying advocates, that thou are a double-dyed knave, and that thou dost deserve hanging and quartering. I dare not descant on thy naughtiness; if I did, even I might lose patience and use harsh language, and this no man in his senses can accuse me of doing. Still, this is proved, and for the sake of justice I must e'en repeat it. Thou has written seditious books, Richard; thou hast tried to stir up people to rebellion; thou hast spoken disrespectfully of kings and holy churches; thou hast proclaimed false doctrines, and thus thou art a public danger. Nay, thou art a public plague, even as thou art a false knave, a lying villain, and a snivelling, hypocritical Presbyterian. I will, therefore, fine thee 500 marks, or to lie a year and a half in King's Bench Prison in default of payment. Now, then, get down on thy false knees, and thank us for our mercy. What, thou canst not pay such a large sum? Serve thee right. Officer, pack him off to gaol, and free the court of his foul presence!"

Upon this the old man looked around upon the faces of the angry spectators, and seemed about to speak.

"No, not a word; pack him off, I say!"

Two officers came forward to lead him away to prison; but they were evidently moved with pity towards him, for they offered him no violence, but rather showed him kindness.

Just as he was leaving the court, he turned towards Jeffreys, and said:

"My lord, there was once a Chief Justice who would have treated me differently."

This was a reference to Sir Matthew Hale, who, during Charles' reign, had endeavored to give justice to Dissenters.

"Then he would have betrayed his country," cried Jeffreys; "ay, betrayed his king, and his country, I tell thee," and by this time Richard Baxter had left the court, although he could still hear every word the judge said, "there's not an honest man in England but looks on thee as a knave."

"It is a lie!"

The voice rang out clear and strong throughout the room, and a second later all eyes were turned towards the youth of whom we have spoken.

"What!" roared Jeffreys.

"It is a lie!" repeated the youth, in the same clear, steady voice. "There is not an honest man in England but looks upon him as a Christian and a man of God."

The youth stood perfectly calm and fearless, looking straight into the eyes of Jeffreys. His lips were compressed and his hands were clasped tightly, but he showed no other sign of perturbation. Jeffreys, however, seemed for the moment too angry to speak.

THE DENOMINATIONS*

EVERY denomination stands for some particular aspect of the truth. If there were no truth in a creed it could not live. The kernel of truth in a creed may not be the one emphasized; other articles in the creed may be far more important; but truth, vital and fundamental, there must be, to give it vitality. To some men, the absolute sovereignty of God, his immutable decrees, his influence over the minds of men, and his character as the source of all good, are the overmastering thought in religion, and they find in Calvinism the fitting expression of the truth, and in the denominations professing Calvinism their most congenial home. But others, conceiving religion from the human side, see that men, too, have a part in salvation. They fear that the emphasis on the Calvinistic doctrines may make men fatalists, and may discourage them from seeking salvation. They lay stress on the promises; on the assurance that every one who seeketh, findeth; on the wide invitation, and on the infinite love of God for all the race. Such men shrink from Calvinism, and turn to Arminianism as a better definition of religion, and find their home in a Methodist Church.

Again, there are some who love order and familiar forms of prayer, graceful, elegant, comprehensive. They enjoy the services of the Protestant Episcopal church, and find in its liturgy the best expression of their soul's desires. Others like to hear in prayer the free, unfettered, unconstrained utterances of the heart, occasionally ungrammatical, but earnest and sincere. To these the services of a non-liturgical church are best adapted. Yet, at heart, all in loyalty to Christ, all these are one. Heredity, environment, the natural bent of mind, have each their determining influence in bringing individuals into church affiliation, and so long as minds differ from one another we shall have differences in religious observance. "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind."

The evil of denominationalism consists not in the existence of these varieties, but in the intolerance that has arisen among them. Why should the man who loves to worship God through an ancient liturgy denounce his brother, whose soul is lifted through the petitions of some minister who uses the language of the modern home? Why should the man who dedicates his child in its infancy by the baptism of sprinkling, ridicule his brother, who believes in baptism by immersion? While all these are trusting in Christ for salvation, they are essentially brethren, in spite of their differences.

Dr. J. M. King, told a minister who differed with him on the doctrines of his denomination, of a significant incident which occurred in New York. A woman, who had been a notorious sinner was dying, and was in great distress. A messenger summoned Dr. King to her bedside. Other messengers had gone out on the same mission, for the case was urgent, and when Dr. King reached the house, he found a Presbyterian minister and a Roman Catholic priest already there. The priest addressing Dr. King, said: "We have talked with her, and have not relieved her distress, will you try?" Dr. King said to her quietly: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and you shall be saved." Almost in a moment a deep peace transfigured the face of the dying woman. "I do believe!" she cried. Later, having been brought up in the Romish Church, she asked the priest to administer extreme unction; but he said: "There is no need. When you reach the place, tell them you are trusting in Christ, and you will be admitted."

The Methodist, the Presbyterian, and the Catholic had the same resource for the dying sinner, and pointed her to the same Saviour. The denominations are working for the same end—to lead men to righteousness, and each is succeeding with the people who respond to its respective methods. Why then should there be rivalry and opposition and hatred between them? The Presbyterian should rejoice if the Methodist has led some sinner to forsake his sins, and pledge himself to Christ. The Methodist should be glad if some other evildoer has been changed through the teaching of his Presbyterian brother. It is the same Saviour who is honored, and the same kingdom into which another citizen is introduced.

A Letter From Labrador

FROM the "Frozen North" there comes to us an interesting letter from Dr. Wilfred Grenfell, that intrepid missionary who has been for years the director of the Labrador Mission. He is familiar to many as the hero of Norman Duncan's stirring novel, Dr. Luke of the Labrador, and also of Dr. Grenfell's Parish.

"My mail came off to me in a small boat," he writes, "and as I have been out of reach of all letters for some time, quite a mass of correspondence had accumulated. It would have amused you to see me wading through it in my chart room, as through a rolling sea. We were just leaving Labrador for the close of the season. We had our vegetables stored for the winter, and the deck was loaded from end to end with barrels of dog food. We had eight dogs to add to our winter team at St. Anthony. Everything was packed full, from ballast deck to sailing deck; even the cuddy was piled high with iron beds for the new orphanage.

"As we steamed through the dark, along this Atlantic coast, on the last day of October, you may be sure we had grateful hearts for the fine weather and smooth sea. I will confess that we had been a little anxious, but danger vanishes when faced.

"Violent storms have been raging off the coast, and many vessels have been wrecked. I sent home yesterday two derelict crews; one of them had been out on the Atlantic for five days and nights. They were soaked to the skin, coated with ice, yet were not a bit the worse for it. No one can help loving the fishermen, when he sees of what splendid material they are.

"The last of October I was as far west as a telegraph office, and talked over the wires to a new missionary, who has joined me as the only medical man on the north side of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Westerly gales had prevented my going to him, and we were one hundred and fifty miles apart. The same mail that brought your letter contained one from Montreal, telling me to go ahead with our hospital."

Thanksgiving at Five Points Mission

What will make the 30th day of November a day of Thanksgiving on the lower East Side of New York, with its poverty and wretchedness, its homelessness and lack of those comforts which arouse a feeling of thankfulness in the hearts of the comfortable and prosperous? The industrial and commercial prosperity of the country, the bountiful harvests, the peace and prosperity which prevail, are meaningless terms to the vast majority of the parishioners and dependent children of the Five Points Mission. How then shall we make it a day of glad thanksgiving? For more than half a century this has been answered in the gifts and donations of money and provisions, sent to the Mission, and through the self-sacrificing labors of Christian women, who forego their own ease to come and provide a feast for nearly a thousand children of the poor. All may help in this Christlike work. Gifts of provisions, especially chickens and turkey, and money, are needed to provide the Thanksgiving Dinner. These may be sent to the Superintendent, Rev. F. J. Belcher, or to Mr. W. H. Rogers, Treasurer, 63 Park Street, New York City.

The "Cruise" Set to Rhyme

Your 800 Cruise-book did receive,
My views on it with pleasure give:
The views in it on Holy Land
To me, I think, are truly grand.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD I do prize
What books get up seem truly wise—
I will it now recommend
To all around, to foe and friend.

A noted friend to my house came,
Showed him the book, pleased with the same,
And was delighted with it, too,
And was so glad he did it view.

In '67 I was there,
It was to us a grand affair:
Mark Twain on it a book did write,
It did so many then delight.

A MORMON WOMAN'S VIEW

The Great Mass of Mormons Sick of Polygamy and Hierarchical Domination

THE leaders of the Mormon church, as is well known, have set at defiance certain laws of the United States, thereby assuming a much-to-be-regretted attitude. The situation is much more serious than the government is aware of.

There have been good men and women, many of them, who joined the church, both in its early days and in later years, believing in the doctrine, and these good, honest people, after once becoming entangled in the labyrinth of intricate meshes woven for them, found themselves as unable to escape as were the gladiators of old from the meshes of the nets thrown over them by their opponents in the arena. These, finally would give up the struggle and allow themselves to be carried along with the whirlpool of evil from which they were unable to extricate themselves. The leaders of the Mormon Church of the present day could, if they desired so to do, redeem the past and restore to the church its original purity of doctrine.

Polygamy is a spurious doctrine—man-made and God-condemned. It pampers to the lust of both men and women. Many evils, too numerous to mention, follow in its trail. It appeals to the cupidity of men and the stupidity of women. It is a cruel doctrine. For what could be more cruel than the casting aside the first wife—who may have borne privations and hardships for the sake of her husband, her heart's choice, her all in all in this life, and upon whom the affections of her whole being is centered—for another woman. Nor is it casting aside the first wife alone—each one in their turn must make way, it may be, perchance, for a younger and fairer woman. Many are the women whose bodies lie mouldering in their graves to-day, who died broken-hearted from this very cause.

Yet polygamy is the centre nerve of the church to-day. Touch polygamy, and it causes a spasm to pass through the whole church.

If anyone belonging to the church speaks against this most absurd doctrine, it is communicated to the head of the church with as much dispatch as an injury to any of the extremities of the physical body is communicated to the brain.

Just so sure as the extremities are the nerve centre of the physical body, just so sure is polygamy the centre nerve of the Mormon Church.

The Mormon Church, although the leaders declare to the contrary, always has, since the first few years of its inauguration, sought supremacy. Even the lay members have been taught to believe that the Mormon Church would become in time, not only the ruling power of the United States, but of the whole world. The present officials of the church have been taught this from their early childhood, and they cling to the belief with the utmost tenacity. No amount of opposition turns them from their course. Reasoning amounts to nothing; persuasion is of no avail. They stubbornly go their own way. In their case, the maxim of the Greeks and Romans can well be applied, "Whom the gods would destroy, they first make mad."

Although the church is but a handful compared to this nation, yet under the crafty influence of the leaders they are a handful of vipers, watching for an opportunity to strike poisonous fangs to some vital spot of that nation which has kindly fostered them. They were taken into that nation under pledge of fealty, as one of her honored family; yet the leaders have not only broken that pledge, but are inciting their followers to do the same, leading them blindfolded into the belief that this nation, the truest friend they have, is their bitterest enemy. This view many, too many, of them accept; but those who have had the opportunity to investigate the true state of affairs, and are farsighted and possess enough intelligence to comprehend the true state of affairs, are anxious and willing to accept any change of an honorable nature that will place them on an equal with other high-minded and respectable denominations.

The leaders, and those whose interest it is to follow them, and also those whose lack of principle does not prevent them from following them, are to be seriously considered; but the greatest danger lies with the unthinking masses, who accept whatever is taught them without question or investigation. If wise and able men, men who could understand and get the sympathy of the people, and gain their confidence, could be placed in control, the work of reformation would be an assured certainty. But as long as matters remain as they are the evil will increase. The only way to eradicate the evil is to strike at the root of it.

Legislation is the only way to wipe out the principles of evil that dominate in Utah. Congress should frame amendments to the Constitution to meet the emergency—frame them in such a manner as to meet fully the exigencies of the situation. The objectionable persons in office should be removed, just as corrupt and inefficient officials are removed from other positions of trust.

The Mormon leaders of the present day have been taught from childhood a doctrine pernicious, lustful and selfish. They were, most of them, brought to this valley when almost infants, and their earliest recollections are of sermons and practices such as to-day they are preaching and advocating.

There has, however, arisen one who will be to the Mormon people a leader if they will allow themselves to be saved. Senator Frank J. Cannon has been associated with the Mormon Church from childhood; he is thoroughly conversant with Mormon history, understands perfectly every peculiarity of Mormon character. His position in the church was such that had he laid principle aside and worked for his own advancement, regardless of what became of the people, his labors would have been light compared with what they now are; but he is working for principle and is willing to abide the consequences. He is putting all of his energies, all of his time, all of his means, into this campaign.

Salt Lake City, Utah. AN AMERICAN.

The Tars and The Christian Herald

A writer in the Brooklyn Standard-Union, describing a visit to the sailors of the British fleet, says:

"Two sailors, one from the Bedford and another from the Drake, were 'rubbering' around in front of the Court House, when a policeman named Terry came along. He thought he might help the men.

"'Know what?' said Terry. 'Those fellows wanted to know where Talmage's Tabernacle was. Said their old mothers had made them read all his sermons in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD when they were boys, and they never read any other sermons, and they wanted to see the old church.'"

If he had made further inquiries, he would have found many other readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD among the jolly blue-jackets of the visiting fleet.

CHILDREN BUILT

The Certain Way to Grow Healthy, turdy Children is by Intelligent Feeding.

A Iowa mother tells of the naturally correct instinct of her 5-year-old boy. She says he thinks there is nothing equal to Grape-Nuts for breakfast.

"When he was a little baby he was puny and ale, and to find the right food to properly nourish him was a difficult problem. When he got to be about 12 months old we commenced using Grape-Nuts food in our family and I began feeding him a little moistened with milk. We all liked Grape-Nuts, but he liked it especially well.

I agreed with him. He began to grow plump and rosy, and for years he has scarcely eaten a breakfast without a dish of Grape-Nuts, and he usually eats nothing else. He wants it and will take no substitute. He has never been sick and to-day is a remarkably robust child with a fine muscular development, and a quick, active brain—by far the healthiest and strongest, even if he is the youngest, of my five children.

All this I attribute to his regular use of Grape-Nuts food." Name given by Postum Co. Battle Creek, Mich.

There's a reason. Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Malachi's Message

By MRS. M. BAXTER

MALACHI (messenger of Jehovah) seems to have succeeded Ezra as the teaching priest or prophet, in the latter days of Nehemiah, and his prophecy probably commenced about B. C. 420, when Nehemiah was absent from Jerusalem twelve years, at the court of Artaxerxes. Comparing Mal. 2: 8 with Neh. 13: 15-29, and Mal. 2: 10-16 with Neh. 13: 23-27, it looks as though the reforms which Nehemiah and Ezra had brought about were not of long duration, and that during the absence of the former in Persia, when probably Ezra died, the people, having no one to lean on, had relapsed into the same abuses as before the revival of which we read in our last lesson. It is so impossible for man, in his own strength, to continue steadfast; it takes a mightier power than dwells in fallen man: only God dwelling in him can keep man true.

Malachi was one of those who took the cause of God deeply to heart. To him God's communication was not simply "the Word of the Lord," as with Hosea, etc., or a vision, as with Obadiah. It was "the burden of the Word of the Lord to Israel, by Malachi": God's burden laid on his prophet's heart. There was a wondrous fellowship with God which existed in some of these prophets of the Old Testament. While Ezra and Nehemiah had faithfully labored to bring about among the people a return to the study of the Scripture, obedience to the law, and integrity and purity of life, God charged Malachi to go deeper, and to unveil the heart-sin of priests and people, and to expose the unreality of the worship which they still observed as a tiresome duty. But while he thus must go to the root of things, and call sins by their names, Malachi was also the messenger of Jehovah in grace, foretelling the coming both of the Lord Jesus and of his forerunner.

His first message is: "I have loved you, saith the Lord." This being so, every indictment of the people must bring them in guilty of sin against love. Yet ye say. Again and again this expression or its equivalent, comes up in this short book. And it does not include only spoken words, but also what a man says in his heart (Psalm 10: 6; 14: 1). God sees down in the heart of man to-day the same question which the hearts of these Jews were saying: "Wherein hast thou loved us?"

God heard another utterance, it proceeded from the priests. God was a Father to Israel (Exodus 4: 22), and a Master who claimed his people's service. The priests had neither taught the people their filial duty due to such a Father, nor yet the service which was due to such a Lord, and God reproached them as "priests that despise my name." "And ye say, Wherein have we despised thy name? Ye offer polluted bread upon mine altar, and ye say, Wherein have we polluted thee? In that ye say, The table of the Lord is contemptible." Down deeply in their hearts, the priests were restive. There was nothing to bring glory to them in the offerings which they offered to the Lord; they were meaningless, except there were through the offerings the real contact with him of which they were the types.

Not having the real thing, and serving God with their lips, while their hearts were far from him; they had become negligent, and offered to the Lord the lame and the sick (vers. 8, 13, 14); anything good enough for him. Is not this the spirit of much of the worship of this day? We must have attractive preachers to interest and amuse us; we must have good music and a good choir to make the service attractive to us. We must have a handsome building and comfortable pews; we take a pride in our church. Yes, all for us, and nothing for God.

Young Knights of Christmas

How They Brought Joy and a Good Dinner to the Lonely Catlin Household

BY ELIZABETH L. GEBHARD

"MOTHER! Alice! Mike's out with Christmas dinners again this year, and he's got two fellers along helping him. I saw them down on de corner by Avenue ". The fellers are none of ours. P'haps er Royal Majesty as gives the dinners, ent along her kids, too, dis year."

At this point Tommy Catlin stopped o take breath. He had run two steps t a time up two flights of stairs, and elivered the foregoing remarks, all apparently on one explosive burst of lifeiving breath. A woman and a girl each urned toward him with eager attention t first, and questioning later.

"Where did they go?"

"Who got them?"

"Have they been on this block?" were he questions that rained on the disenser of Christmas news.

"I told yer Mike was drivin' down Avenue C, didn't I? And I saw de towleaded feller shoulder two baskets and o into Miss Varney's house. Mike himelf ducked into de rear behind Cavalry akes, while de black-haired kid drove n. Dey weren't comin' this way," dded the boy gloomily.

"No matter, it is early yet," returned he mother hopefully, doing her best to righten the drooping faces of her two hildren.

The year before, the Christmas dinners donated by one of the large-hearted vomen of New York, had not been a natter of so vital an interest to the Catlin family. This year, if they were ot included in the line of distribution, here would be no Christmas dinner at ll for them. For months the head of he little family had been coughing his ife away. His wife had been urged to ut him in a hospital, but whenever they alked the matter over together, the faher would say, "I can't last much longer, nother, and I wish you would keep me y you." And she, with her love grown o pathos, would answer, "I surely will ry, Jim. You've always felt that way."

But love and sentiment could not fill ive hungry mouths, pay the rent, and ind medicine for the sick husband, and he unequal struggle had been going on for nearly a year now. Mrs. Catlin took in washing, but this occupation had its disadvantages. On washing days her husband was an exile in the little dark bedroom opening off the living room, in an effort to escape the choking steam. When it was bright outside, he stayed out in the sunshine as much as possible, but ironing days were the red letter days in the family life, for then they were all together again, Mother Catlin ironing at one board, twelve-year-old Alice at another, and the father occupying the chairs in turn, until all were filled with freshly-ironed clothing.

At the last there was always the window sills, that were fortunately wide, and one of them gave a good vantage ground for watching a little wire and paper wind-mill, which the sick man had fashioned in his many spare minutes, and fastened to the stovepipe. The strong heat of the ironing-fire kept the little thing spinning, and gave just a touch of lightsomeness to the steady toil.

Alice Catlin counted for more in the little home than could easily be imagined, for the mother had only one arm, and though her ingenuity was wonderful, her many methods of supplying the place of the lost member failed when it came to the ruffles and embroidery in the fine ironing. This was Alice's work. Before school, at noon, and at night, the little girl worked as if she were a little woman, instead of a child robbed of her playtime. Tommy and Fred, the younger children, ran errands and washed dishes, but it was Alice and her mother's one whole arm on which the family life depended. No wonder they could not compass a Christmas dinner.

A missionary nurse had visited them some weeks earlier and left a cough mixture and some milk tickets. The nurse carried away more than she brought, in the shape of inspiration from this one-armed woman, who often breakfasted at four on dry bread in order to accomplish her day's work, and who could say in the face of such trials, "The rent has never failed me yet; but it keeps me a contrivin' and contrivin'; so you see I ain't got time for no discouragements."

With a thought of the endless chain of washdays ahead for Mrs. Catlin, the nurse meant to see that a clothes wringer went to her for Christmas, if she could touch some kind heart with the brave little woman's story.

* * * * * * *

Joe Chandler and Reginald Pitkins, two sixteen-year boys, who had been impressed into the service of distributing Christmas dinners, found they had no sinecure on their hands. In their own homes Christmas was full of bustle and brightness and happy secrets. This work that they had consented to do among the poor was an entirely new experience.

They drove through long streets of tenements, not always forbidding on the outside, but scenes of poverty and barrenness within. Occasionally their errand took them into basement homes, but oftener they dashed with their baskets up flight after flight of stairs. Midway between sidewalk and top floor they often came upon Egyptian darkness where they could but feel their way. Their eyes could no longer pierce the gloom. The baskets of Christmas dinners, that swung easily out of the wagon in the street below, grew weighty ere they reached the fifth or sixth floor.

Long before noon the boys began to feel the keen pangs of hunger, and a growing sympathy for those who must wait on others' charity for a full stomach. While Mike, on familiar ground, went for his noonday meal the boys reconnoitered in search of some appetizing viands. These they found at last in a neat little bakeshop some distance from the scene of their morning labors. Griddle cakes and crullers disappeared with astonishing rapidity, till the young knights felt fortified for more Christmas baskets and tenement stairs.

Through the long afternoon they kept on shouldering baskets filled with chicken and potatoes apples and celery, onions, and tea and sugar. If the weight grew heavy in their hands they left light hearts in the poverty-stricken homes. Tommy Catlin caught up with them at four o'clock, and found the "tow-headed feller" mopping the moist hair on his hot forehead before he made another onslaught on a sixth story. Tommy would have been glad to give a helping hand to earn a dinner, but for once was shy in the presence of "Her Majesty's kids."

"It's no use mother," he said at six, as he slowly mounted the stairs and opened the door into a room of billowy dresses and snowy linen, by this time heaping every available piece of furniture, and swinging with a life-like motion from the corners of the picture-frames, "I saw them clearing off the route, only a basket left, and they goin' in the other direction."

There wasn't much could be said. Mrs. Catlin and Alice were both very tired, the children were hungry, and such as she had, the mother set before her hungry brood, telling them they were better off than many.

Christmas Eve without stockings in the fireplace, or a Christmas dinner in the pantry is a sad time. Mrs. Catlin and Alice were finishing the last pieces of ironing; Tommy preparing to carry a basket of freshly laundered clothes home, and Jimmy, for the want of something more cheerful to do was pulling the cat's tail, when they all looked up at a sudden exclamation of the father's, who, from his post on the window seat, had recognized in the brightly lighted street below, the Christmas dinner trio and their wagon, right in front of their door.

It took both the young knights to bring up the Christmas gifts for the Catlins.

"It took both the young Knights to bring up the Christmas gifts"

The Angels' Christmas Service

A SERMON BY

REV. R. M. PATTERSON, D.D., LL.D.

TEXT—HEB. I: 6: "Let all the angels of God worship him"

THE Bible has much to say about the holy angels of God. They were created before man. They were higher than man, though glorified, redeemed men, are higher than they. They are bright, powerful, ever active agents of God. Jesus Christ our Redeemer was not one of these angels; he was indeed their Creator. In the first chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews, the writer argues for his greatness by showing his infinite superiority to them. He specially declares that they worship him as their God. The Father commanded them to worship him when, as God incarnate, God in human form, as a Child, he appeared on earth.

It was a wonderful worship which the angels paid to Jesus when he was born in Bethlehem. A wonderful sermon was preached by one angel. There was grand, beautiful singing, and a thrilling doxology by a great congregation of angels; a magnificent service of praise. Our worship now should be brought into close contact with that angelic worship of the Son of God, made flesh in Bethlehem nineteen centuries ago.

"Earth's jubilee proclaimed in the song of the angels." A fitting conclusion it was, too, to the series of services which the heavenly beings had rendered in the announcements of the coming of the only begotten Son of God into the world. As Zacharias attended to the duties of his priestly office in the Temple, Gabriel appeared to him, and announced the birth of the forerunner of the Lord. Again, the same angel burst into the presence of the astonished Mary, and revealed to her the mystery of the generation of the Holy One. Joseph was warned by one against taking a false step away from the mother of our Lord. Then, just as Bethlehem's manger was witnessing the wonderful incarnation, and as the star took its place in the heavens above it, to direct the Eastern wise men to the sacred spot, behold the heavens were all aglow with the glory, of the Lord, while an angel appeared to the shepherds with the utterance of the good tidings of great joy which shall be to all people.

But all this was not enough. Our earth was witnessing the grandest event that has ever occurred upon it; and therefore it was meet that in God's own magnificent way the heavens should bear full testimony to it. Men had made no preparation to receive the Prince of Glory, as is done when the birth of a child in a mighty family is expected; the paltry paraphernalia of earth would have seemed all too dim for such a purpose. The inhabitants of heaven form his glorious train: and as the angel tells the shepherds of the wonderful birth, and gives them the sign by which they shall recognize the divinely begotten child, suddenly there is with him "a multitude of the heavenly host praising God and saying 'Glory to God in the highest and on earth peace among men in whom he is well pleased.'" (R.V.)

This was the Doxology with which "the first preaching of the Gospel on earth" after the advent of the divine Redeemer was closed. As the shepherds kept watch in the field by night, the glory of the Lord had shone round about them. The manifested presence of God, which makes heaven a place of unutterable brightness, was there.

It was the opening of heaven itself, nay, the coming down of heaven to usher in the bright Gospel day, and to show that though its Lord had left it for a season of humiliation, it was to be a glorious scene to him, to earth and to heaven itself. And lo! from that brightly shining glory had come forth an angel. One of the heavenly beings who shouted for joy when the world was made and man placed upon it; one of the heavenly beings who through all the history of our fallen race had shown their kindly interest in their humble fellow creatures, and who had been ascending and descending on the ladder of mercy in the prosecution of the offices of kindness to them; one of the pure beings of whom it is written that they are ministering spirits sent forth to minister to the heirs of salvation; one of them came forth from that glorious appearance and preached the Gospel of Jesus Christ:

"Be not afraid: for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be to all the people: for there is born to you this day in the city of David a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord. And this is the sign unto you: Ye shall find a babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, and lying in a manger." (R. V.)

The sermon was sweet, and cheering, and exhilarating: the Doxology was all in tune with it, and was fitted to fill the souls of the shepherd congregation with rapture. What a magnificent choir sang it! A multitude of the heavenly host! They had accompanied the divine Redeemer when he came from heaven to th manger—when he stooped from his throne of glory fo the purpose of tabernacling in human form. They ha worshiped him even in his humiliated state in th stable. There they had acknowledged and recognize their God and paid him the honor which was due. An as they return with Gabriel to their heavenly position they pause with him for a little while over the fields o Bethlehem, to invest his message with increased dignit and majesty by their multitudinous presence and b their glorious outburst. Earth was silent that night but heaven was active, joyous, jubilant, brilliant wit the introduction of the great Gospel day.

Poets have fancied the music of the spheres. Her it is. This Doxology reverberated through the univers from orb to orb, from system to system, and still i thrills creation's infinite heart.

There's a song in the air!
There's a star in the sky!
There's a mother's deep prayer
And a babe's low cry!
And the star rains its fire while the beautiful sing,
For the manger of Bethlehem cradles a king!

There's a tumult of joy
O'er the wonderful birth,
For the Virgin's sweet boy
Is the Lord of the earth.
Aye, the star rains its fire, and the beautiful sing,
For the manger of Bethlehem cradles a king!

In the light of that star
Lie the ages impearled;
And that song from afar
Has swept over the world.
Every hearth is aflame, and the beautiful sing
In the homes of the nations that Jesus is king.

We rejoice in the light
And we echo the song
That comes down through the night
From the heavenly throng.
Aye, we shout to the lovely evangel they bring,
And we greet in his cradle our Saviour and King.

The Doxology of an army: but a Doxology of peace! "It was over no battle field, the most sacred to truth and liberty, these angels hovered; no blazing homesteads, nor burning cities, shed their lurid gleam on the skies they made radiant with light; nor was it when their sweet voices mingled with the clash of arms and the shouts of charging squadrons that they sang of glory, goodwill, and peace." It was on peaceful hills and over such peaceful men as shepherds that the heavenly host sang this Doxology.

As in the past, the angels exhibited their interest in the redemption of our race, and thus glorified God because of it, in the future they and the redeemed appear united in a grander song in heaven; for among the enrapturing visions which the beloved disciple has recorded in the Apocalypse is one in the fifth chapter, which first represents the redeemed of the human race as singing this new song to the glorified Redeemer: "Thou wast slain and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood out of every kindred and tongue and people and nation, and hast made us unto our God kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth." And then the angels unite with them, saying with a loud voice: "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom and strength and honor, and glory, and blessing."

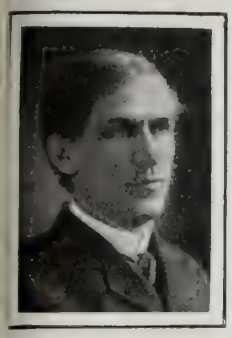
It was a wonderful worship which the angels paid to Jesus

A GREAT REVIVAL IN NEW JERSEY

A Simultaneous Movement of the Evangelistic Armies Upon Eighteen Cities and Towns, and the Results

By REV. E. W. LOUCKS

THERE is a rising tide of evangelism in this country. Those who are in a position to speak with authority, declare that there is a more intelligent interest awakened at this time in the better sort of evangelistic work than at any time during the past ten years. This interest is not confined to any particular locality, nor to any individual denomination; but in all parts of the United States, from ocean to ocean, wherever the Gospel is being preached in these days in a special evangelistic way, the results seem to be highly gratifying.



Rev. Henry Ostrom, D.D.

Four years ago, the Presbyterian denomination took a decided stand in favor of evangelism, appointed a special committee, with Mr. John H. Converse of Philadelphia as chairman, and the Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D.D., and others as active members of the committee. Dr. Chapman has been in this work from its inception, but now evangelistic committees have been appointed by the Methodists, the Congregationalists, the United Presbyterians, the United Brethren, the Christian, and several other denominations. This special interest in the country does not seem to be particularly denominational; as a rule, interdenominational meetings are more generally held. One of the best features of the present-day evangelism is this, that both pastors and churches seem to be imbued with the fact that people ought to be led to Jesus Christ, and the question of church membership be left entirely to themselves.

Rev. J. H. Elliott, D.D.

The Simultaneous plan of moving a city is comparatively new. The Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D.D., formerly pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church of New York City, by virtue of his connection with the Presbyterian Evangelistic Committee, has been the leader in this work. The plan is to move a city not from a centre, but from various districts. In the city of St. Paul seven districts were in operation, in Minneapolis sixteen. The Simultaneous plan, it is believed, enables the evangelist, in co-operation with the pastors, to move a greater number of people in a less time. In Minneapolis, as many as twenty-five or thirty thousand people would attend the services in a single day. On Sunday, the number of attendants was even greater. In this way, the smaller churches are more effectively reached, and all classes and conditions of people are brought within the sweep of the work.

Rev. W. E. Biederwolf

There is at present in progress in the State of New Jersey a great "Simultaneous Movement," which is not only designed to move a single city, but to stir an entire State. In Paterson, eight evangelists, with their singers, are laboring; in Jersey City the same number; in Newark there are seven districts, with an evangelist and his singer in each. In addition, the following cities and towns are included: Bloomfield, Englewood, Orange, Elizabeth. New Brunswick, Manasquan, Rahway, Bound Brook, Summit, Perth Amboy, Trenton, Montclair, Vineland, Newton, and Metuchen.

Rev. Henry W. Stough

Dr. Chapman is in charge of this State Campaign, and is assisted by Rev. Henry Ostrom, D.D., Rev. W. C. Evans, D.D., Rev. R. A. Walton, D.D., Rev. John H, Elliott, D.D., Rev. J. R. Pratt, Rev. H. W. Stough, Rev. John Robertson, D.D., Rev. Clarence B. Strouse, D.D., Rev. H. D. Sheldon, Rev. Daniel S. Joy, Rev. F. E. Taylor, Rev. C. C. Smith, Rev. Arthur J. Smith, D.D., Rev. W. E. Biederwolf and others.

Special meetings are held for men only, and for women only, and for children and young people. One of the most unique features is the service conducted in the saloons by Mr. and Mrs. William Asher. They visit the saloons, preach the Gospel, sing some of the more attractive Gospel hymns, give an invitation to those who are there to come to Christ, and then announce the meetings in the vicinity of the place where the saloon meeting is held. Their work is highly spoken of by the pastors who have studied it. Dr. Chapman also has planned in each city a midnight meeting, especially designed to reach the people who attend the more notorious variety theatres. A delegation from each church is asked to attend, and before the play is over, an announcement is made by some one representing the ministers, of the meeting at once to be held, and, as a rule, at least half the audience will remain. These services have been most fruitful.

The Paterson, N. J. Call, reporting such a service recently held in that city, told of "five thousand people who sang hymns, standing in the rain, while services were being held in a local theatre. Young and old, rich and poor surged through the streets." The report continued:

A Gospel Meeting in a New Jersey Dance Hall

"Like a mighty army, led by some unseen leader, whose presence was nevertheless felt, thousands of people, filled with religious enthusiasm, joined in the procession which preceded the midnight meeting at the theatre. Not hundreds, but thousands made up the great black moving mass of life which stretched through Market and Main Streets, and wended its way towards the West Street amusement house. Supreme adoration pictured on score after score of faces, with voices raised in hallelujah songs, which resounded for blocks and blocks, the great throng of converted hosts made the most remarkable sight ever seen on the streets of Paterson.

Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman

"Unable to gain entrance to the meeting at the Market Street Methodist Episcopal Church, hundreds of men and women stood out in the uncomfortable damp under a drizzling rain, and sang until their voices were hoarse. As the minutes fleeted, the crowd outside the church was increased. Touched with the religious spirit, the newcomers took up the strains of the 'Glory Song,' and sang ceaselessly. At this time there were easily three thousand people gathered in West Street, clamoring for admission to the theatre. Then came the awful crush. Women and men fought for the entrance frantically, but not roughly. The theatre was just letting the people out from the regular performance, and the crushing ceased — but the singing continued. A stalwart man, inspiration glowing on his every feature, and religious fervor depicted in every movement, mounted the steps of the theatre entrance, and with the waving of his arms, led the singing host. Never before did the theatre hold such an audience as attended the midnight service. Never before was there such a volume of voice lifted up in the praise of the Lord within the playhouse walls. It was a most extraordinary occasion throughout." Dr. Chapman pleaded with the sinners in the building, with all the power and eloquence within him, to forsake their paths of sin. He said, "Maybe some of you have a mother whom you have not written in years." He told the story of one man who had broken his mother's heart by breaking many laws of God and man. He pleaded with them for their mother's sake, if no other, to flee from the wrath to come. Then he said, "Bow your heads in prayer." Not a face remained upturned toward him; every head was bowed. "Thank you for that," said the speaker, adding, "Now how many are there who will say, when you pray, 'Pray for me?' Those of you who will say just that, put up your hand." He spoke softly. "You needn't be afraid. God will help you"—still softer, and he leaned over the footlights. Then Mr. Butler began to sing, "I'm Coming Home," with his fine expression. Men in many parts of the hall were unable to withhold their tears and burst into audible sobs. Hands rose in all parts of the hall. They came up so fast that it was impossible to count them. Some one said that there were more than two hundred who lifted their hands. These persons were not the rougher element in the room, either. Many were well dressed, and when Dr. Chapman asked those who did really desire to lead better lives to take him by the hand, after he stepped from the stage, more than fifty rose in all parts of the hall, stepped toward the centre aisle and grasped the evangelist by the hand.

John P. Hillis, Singer

Rev. Daniel S. Joy

Rev. R. A. Walton, D.D.

Much is made of the singing of the Gospel in the evangelistic meetings. Each evangelist is accompanied by his own singer, and these men are men of remarkable ability. Mr. Fred Butler, the soloist with Dr. Chapman, was formerly a singer in opera, and is one of the most effective Gospel soloists in the country. He has consecrated his magnificent voice to the service of God. Mr. John P. Hillis, who is singing with Dr. Ostrom, has been longest in the field, and is not only a great soloist, but is a capable director of a large choir. The other evangelistic singers are all very successful, and their work is highly spoken of.

This New Jersey State Campaign is being carefully studied by ministers and Christian workers, and it is believed that similar meetings might profitably be held in other parts of the country. Dr. Chapman and his associates labor in Syracuse N. Y., after leaving New Jersey; then a State Campaign in Idaho will be undertaken, and following the Idaho meetings, a campaign will be opened in Texas.

THE LANDLORD OF THE INN

A Christmas Reverie

By REV. DAVID JAMES BURRELL, D.D., LL.D.

"There was no room for them at the inn." LUKE 2: 7

Joseph and Mary at the House of Chimham

THE traveler had grown weary of the monotonous path, ascending the hills that skirt the vale of Hebron, when his muleteer turned, and, pointing to a huddled throng of white buildings in the distance, said simply "Bethlehem!"

It was the twenty-fourth day of December; but the star that, in the fitness of things, should have been hovering over the village, was not there. The hot sun, instead, was blazing down upon it. A mosque and minaret in the foreground bore silent witness to an alien occupation. Beyond was a convent, surmounted by a cross.

Thither the traveler turned his steps. As he approached, he heard the pealing of an organ and voices chanting, "Holy Mary, mother of God, pray for us!"

At the doorway of the convent a tonsured monk, an Italian, in the brown habit of the Capuchins, with cowl and sandals and a hempen rope about his loins, bade him welcome. "But before you enter," he said, pointing to a grotto in the opposite rock, "observe where the Virgin Mother hid herself from the wrath of Herod before the flight into Egypt."

He led the way through the broad hall, the chapel and the reliquarium, where, among other things, was shown a little hand, brown and shrunken, which, he confidently assured his companion, "belonged to one of the infants slain in Herod's massacre." A stairway here descended into a large chamber, where Jerome is said to have written the Vulgate version of the Scriptures. A little further on, to the left, was the entrance to the Grotto of the Nativity; a semicircular recess, illuminated by a score of pendent chandeliers, and paved with mosaic, in the centre of which was a golden star with the legend: Hic natus est Christus de Virgine (Here Christ was born of the Virgin).

The traveler stood at the threshold of this grotto deeply moved by its sacred memories. He saw the altar at its further end, dimly lighted by five latticed lamps; over the altar a picture of the Nativity; on one side a hollow slab of marble, the reputed "manger" of the Christ-child; on the other, a stone prie-dieu, where the three kings of the Orient are said to have knelt while offering their gifts. As his eyes wandered from one object to another they rested at length on the low archway above him, where two Hebrew words had been graven so deeply in the stone that the centuries had not obliterated them:

"בית כמהם" (Beth-Chimham).

He looked inquiringly at his companion, who laid his finger on his lips and beckoned toward the chapel. As they sat together there, the monk explained: "The ancient name of this place was that which you saw engraven on the arch, 'The House of Chimham.' It is first mentioned in connection with the history of David as recorded in the sacred scroll."

He withdrew for a moment and returned with a roll of manuscript, to which he referred now and then as he proceeded with the story (II. Sam. 19: 31-40). "When David was returning from exile after the defeat of his enemies in the Wood of Ephraim, he was met by the aged Barzillai, who, having entertained him hospitably, conducted him over the Fords of Jordan. For this service the king kissed him and desired to appoint him to a place in his retinue. But Barzillai said, 'How long have I to live, that I should go up with the king unto Jerusalem? I am this day fourscore years old, and thy servant would be but a burden. But behold my son Chimham; do to him what shall seem good unto thee.'

"Now of all the ancestral possessions of David there was none more precious than this parcel of ground. It had been a portion of the field of Boaz, in which Ruth, the Moabitess, had gleaned after the reapers. The home of David's boyhood was here, the pastures where he had watched his flocks, the grotto itself, the well (II Samuel 23: 15), and the old roof-tree. And this was the gift bestowed on Chimham in return for his father's loyalty.

"On the spot where the convent now stands he built his home; and the hospitality of the House of Chimham became a proverb in the land. Here he, and his children after him, as time passed, gave greeting to weary pilgrims. And when, after some hundreds of years, the Babylonians invaded the land and razed the Holy City, this was the refuge of the last despairing band of fugitives who halted here, under the leadership of the prophet Jeremiah, for a council of war (Jeremiah 41: 17). And from this caravansary, bearing the burden of Ariel and leaving the inheritance of the covenant behind them, they passed on into their perpetual exile."

At this point in the monk's narrative the clear stroke of a bell from the tower of the convent called him. He rose with a hasty explanation, and left the traveler sitting on the oaken bench alone. The bell ceased tolling, the swinging lamps by the stairway of the grotto shone dimly, the vesper song in the chapel came faintly from the distance. The tranquilizing influences of the place and hour were over him.

On a sudden, he imagined that an aged Jew was standing beside him, who said, "I was once the landlord of this inn."

"It must have been long ago," traveler replied, "for the monks h dwelt in this monastery since the Emp Helena founded it."

"Yes, I was here," he said, "at the t of the taxing under Cyrenius. That the year the Messiah was born."

"Tell me, then," asked the trave "how it was that you did not entert Joseph and Mary? Surely you kn the necessity was urgent. Could you have made some provision for the man his weary companion?"

"Alas, I did not know! The hope of Isr was indeed about to be realized, but h should I understand it? Our rulers themsel were blind, and I, a mere inn-keeper, h was I to know?"

There was a tone of deep sadness and measurable regret in his voice as he proceed "I remember it all very clearly. It was the close of a short winter's day that the grims arrived. The inn was crowded. T was the time of the census, you know; a the families of the lineage of David were required to enroll here. They had been co ing in for days, and every lewan was f And what was there to specially comm these pilgrims to me? It is true they were royal descent, but of fallen fortunes, t The man was a mere peasant, a carpenter he told me, from the despised town of Na reth. Which of the distinguished guests in caravansary—priests, rabbis, wealthy trad —could I exclude to make room for him? H I realized what subsequently proved to the fact, I might have acted differently, b how was I to know?"

"Was it with your consent," asked the trav er, "that they found shelter in the cave near by

"It was. There was nothing else to be do for them. It was better than to rest unc the open sky. There were cattle there a beasts of burden. The place afforded shel from the wind, and there was barley-straw rest on."

"And Jesus was born that night?"

"That night—that cold midwinter nigh The first intimation we had of the Child's bir was in the early twilight of the morning wh a company of shepherds came to the inn te ing a wonderful tale: 'We were in the fiel keeping the watch over our flock, when l the angel of the Lord came upon us, and t glory of the Lord shone round about us, a we were sore afraid. And the angel sai Fear not; for behold I bring you good ti ings of great joy which shall be to all peopl For unto you is born this day in the city David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord. And th shall be a sign unto you: Ye shall find the bal wrapped in swaddling clothes lying in a manger.' A suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of t heavenly host praising God and saying, 'Glory to G in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will towa men.' And it came to pass that as the angels were go away into heaven, we said one to another, 'Let us g even unto Bethlehem and see this thing which is co to pass', which the Lord hath shown unto us."

"Did you believe the story of the shepherds?" aske the traveler. "Was it not a mere figment of sleep an starlight and superstitious fancy?"

"At first I doubted; but when I brought them to th cave, the Child was there, 'wrapped in swaddling cloth and lying in a manger.' The shepherds said, 'This surely the Christ—the long-looked-for Christ!' and the knelt and worshiped him. But how was I to know? sought the rabbi of the village and asked him. H showed me the record where it was written that th Messiah was to be born of a Virgin at Bethlehem and a about this time. That was all I could find out."

"How long did the family remain at Bethlehem?"

"For many days. I would have removed them t better quarters, but they thought it wise to continue a

THE HEBREWS' "PILGRIM DAY"

They Celebrate the Two Hundred and Fiftieth Anniversary of their Landing in America

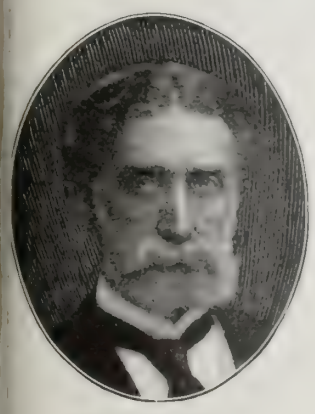
Temple Shearith Israel, New York

ONE of the notable events of the present season has been the celebration of the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the Jewish settlement in America. Hebrew societies and synagogues and a large number of organizations throughout the country, have worked energetically and enthusiastically to make the celebration a memorable one.

A century before the coming of the Pilgrims and the Puritans, there was a settlement of Hebrews in the southern part of this continent. The first Jew to land on North American soil, whose name has been preserved, was Jacob Barsimon. He came to New Amsterdam from Holland, on the ship Pear Tree, on July 4, 1654. He was followed during that same year by a band of twenty-three refugees, probably from Brazil.

Following the discovery of America, numbers of Hebrews were found among the colonists in South America. This came about through the action of Portugal in actually deporting shiploads of persons condemned by the Inquisition. After a time they became too numerous in Brazil, nearly all the sugar plantations being in the hands of Hebrews, and another edict forbade their further settlement in any Spanish or Portuguese colonies. For a time after the Dutch conquest this edict was annulled. The liberties of Hebrews being thus once more assured, their numbers greatly increased. They now engaged largely in commerce, and enjoyed the same rights as other Dutch subjects.

A fact worthy of note is that at the time of the Jews' admission into America, they were also re-admitted into England. When Brazil again fell into the hands of Portugal it was a dark day for the Israelites, and they lost no time in scattering in all directions. Those who first came to New Amsterdam met with anything but a friendly reception, little sympathy being extended to these hounded and persecuted people. But for the intervention of the Dutch West India Company, they would probably have been obliged to resume their wanderings.



Isaac N. Seligman

Though Governor Stuyvesant stormed and threatened to have the Hebrews sent away, they managed to stay in spite of him. Petty restrictions prevented them from engaging in the retail trade and public service; they were even forbidden to build a synagogue, or to purchase land for a burying-ground. The names of some of these patient and long-suffering Jewish pioneers have been preserved until the present day. The first Jew to hold real estate in New York State was Asser Levy, who bought and held a lot on what is now the site of the city of Albany. On July 14, 1656, the Rev. Abraham de Lucena obtained permission to purchase ground for a cemetery. This burial ground is still in possession of the Spanish and Portuguese congregation, Shearith Israel, of New York City. This was the first Hebrew congregation in the United States, and its people carry in an unbroken line the blood of the Hebrews who fled from Brazil to escape persecution, and who stayed on in Manhattan despite the bigotry and persecution of old Peter Stuyvesant and his colleagues. The congregation of Shearith Israel has kept its orthodox strictness, even as it was observed when it first gathered, two hundred and fifty years ago, in a private house on Mill Street, a thoroughfare no longer in existence. A regular synagogue was not built until 1729. The site was near the old Mill Street house, but the building was burned in 1818 and then rebuilt. In time the congregation moved to Crosby Street; thence to Nineteenth Street near Fifth Avenue, and finally to the stately edifice in Seventieth Street, facing Central Park. The Rev. H. Pereira Mendes, the rabbi of this congregation, is a direct descendant of one of its earlier pastors, the Rev. Benjamin P. Mendes, minister from 1753 to 1759.

Among well-known Hebrews who have been noted for their philanthropic and other good works, stand the names of Judah Touro, who, more than fifty years ago, bequeathed to charitable institutions in various cities $450,000; Oscar Straus, Cyrus L. Sulzberger and Isaac Seligman, and others of the present day. Jews have been prominent as bankers in the United States from Hayne Solomon, of Revolutionary era, down to Jacob H. Schiff of our own day. Among prominent Jewish ministers is Rev. Dr. S. Shulman, who is rabbi of Temple Beth-el, at Fifth Avenue and Seventy-sixth Street. This is a magnificent structure, and is one of the largest synagogues in America.

It is in the United States that the Jew has been the most active, and it is here that he has scored his greatest conquests. America has indeed been the Promised Land to the persecuted, who have found liberty and justice here.

New York city has nearly half of the entire Jewish population of the United States. There are more Hebrews in this country than in the German Empire, France and Holland put together. Many times more Jews are in this one American town to-day than were in Jerusalem when it was captured and destroyed by Titus, or during the height of its power and population as the capital of the Jewish kingdom.

Of $5,000,000,000 worth of property in New York $1,000,000,000 is owned by Hebrews.

On Thanksgiving Night, Hebrews throughout the Union celebrated the part their people have taken in American history. From all over the country they came to participate in this 250th anniversary of the Jewish Pilgrim Day. Exercises were held in Carnegie Hall, New York, ex-President Cleveland, Gov. Higgins, and Mayor McClellan being among the speakers. The keynote to all the speeches and prayers was the blessings which the Jew has found in America. It was truly a day of thanksgiving. Every seat in the great hall was filled, and many hundreds stood during the exercises.

In his speech, Mr. Cleveland referred to the important part which the Jews took in the discovery of America, Columbus, in his voyage in search of a new world, being aided in a most substantial way by Jewish support and comradeship. The speaker also referred to the part taken by the Jews in the Revolution, and the aid they had offered in every national emergency. "It is not among them," he said, "that dangerous discontent and violent demonstrations against peace and order are hatched."

Temple Beth-el, New York

A letter from President Roosevelt was read, in which he said:

> The lamentable and terrible suffering to which so many of the Jewish people in other lands have been subjected, makes me feel it my duty, as the head of the American people, not only to express my deep sympathy for them as I now do, but, at the same time, to point out what fine qualities of citizenship have been displayed by the men of Jewish faith and race, who, having come to this country, enjoy the benefits of free institutions and equal treatment before the law.
> I feel very strongly that if any people are oppressed anywhere, the wrong inevitably reacts in the end on those who oppress them, for it is an immutable law in the spiritual world that no one can wrong others, and yet in the end himself escape unhurt.

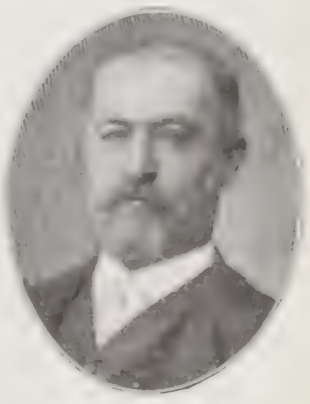
An interesting feature connected with this celebration, was a fair held by the Shearith Israel Sisterhood. Among many articles of interest on exhibition, was a priceless collection of objects of Jewish ceremonial. Many of these are family heirlooms belonging to Hadji Ephraim Benguiat, a descendant of an illustrious Spanish Jewish family, which dates its origin as far back as the eleventh century. Among these relics, was a scroll of the Pentateuch, in Hebrew, made in Smyrna in the eighteenth century. The silver bells on the rollers, bear the inscription: "Joseph, son of Ephraim Benguiat." There was a copy of the Old Testament, printed in 1573 A.D., a beautifully chased brass dish, made in the fifteenth century, used at Passover meal; richly embroidered satin cushions, used to lean upon at Passover meal, these were made in Bulgaria in the sixteenth century. Also a dish to hold the symbolical articles in the service, made by Jews in the thirteenth century, and glazed in Italy in the sixteenth century.

Beautifully embroidered linens, satins and velvet covers, hangings and cushions, all bearing unmistakable evidences of almost priceless value, were artistically arranged about the room, making a striking background for various illustrations of Bible scenes, done in tapestry silk, embroidery, and also painted in oil. The proceeds of this fair are to be applied to the relief of the unfortunate and persecuted Russian Jewish refugees now in New York, and to other charitable objects. In a sermon, delivered by the Rev. Dr. Mendes, during the anniversary celebration, he said:



Jacob H. Schiff

> We are sent to this land, to all lands, to be witnesses for God. Tell me not it was chance that brought us here. It was the hand of God. We are here to preserve the great truth. God has given us rest. Our fathers passed through the sea, and we come to live in pleasant places.

Christmas Festivities

OUR annual celebration of the Saviour's birth, associated as it is in the home and in society with festivity and the giving and receiving of loving remembrances, should never lose its real meaning to any intelligent mind. Christmas day is rightly a day of rejoicing, of family reunion, of sociality and benevolence, but it has a significance above all of these. The cheerful greetings and the generous impulses of the season are appropriate and in harmony with the event we celebrate; but we need always to keep in mind what the connection between them and that event actually is, in order that Christmas shall have its true import in a Christian land. We do not want Christmas to become merely a holiday on the calendar, but a joyous commemoration of the supreme event in the world's history.

Considerations of this fact do not rob the day of any of its delights. He, whose coming to this world we celebrate, did not appear among men as a gloomy ascetic. He mingled freely in society and joined in the social festivities of his time. He was among the guests at a wedding, he accepted the invitation of the aristocrat and of the plebeian to their feasts, and was on familiar terms with the household of Bethany. As the angels declared on that wondrous night, peace and good-will were to be the keynote of his coming. The thought of him, therefore, casts no cloud on our family gatherings, puts no depressing solemnity on the fun and merriment of the season. It was a fuller, more abundant life that Christ brought to this world, and we have a right to rejoice in his coming and to make the season of his birth a time of glad festivity.

Our celebration, then, rightly understood, is that of the coming into this world of a Being, containing in himself the power of uplifting the human race. To poor, struggling humanity, conscious of its weakness, the hand of the Deity was stretched out that Christmas night, and it has been a new world ever since. Slowly and painfully, with many a fall, it has toiled upward, grasping blindly and feebly that helping hand. Jesus said: "I, if I be lifted up, I will draw all men unto me"; and he has fulfilled the pledge. From him has come the inspiration that has moved men to toil for the betterment of the race. Liberty, enlightenment, benevolence, have developed under his benign influence, and even the races that have rejected him, have been benefited by his coming. Like the inn at Bethlehem, the souls of men have too often been so full of other guests, that there has been no room for him; but to those who have admitted him, he has brought a joy unknown before and a peace that passes understanding. Their number is growing; in every land millions of those in whose heart Jesus has been born again increases, and will increase, until at last the whole world shall join in a glad Christmas celebration, in which he is acclaimed Redeemer and King. Then he will look on the travail of his soul and be satisfied.

The Women's Club Movement

THE recent utterances of ex-President Cleveland on the question of women's clubs have attracted widespread attention, being discussed from Maine to California in press and pulpit. Mr. Cleveland, as is well known, is not an advocate of woman suffrage, nor of women's clubs as they now exist. He says that the ballot is one of the chief aims of these organizations, and that their tendencies are radical; that they cause women to neglect their more important duties for outside affairs.

In regard to the political aspect of women's organizations, it is true that there are a number of bodies whose only cause for being is the desire for political equality with men. These, however, are only a few out of many hundreds formed for literary and philanthropic purposes, and it is by these last that they should be judged. As stated by some of the writers in the Symposium on another page of this issue, political discussion is strictly prohibited by the constitutions of most clubs. We do not believe that these organizations are intensely radical, but that they act as a conservative force in the community. If it is radical to protect children in factories, give better facilities to our schools, dig boards of education out of their moss-grown ruts, and beautify the ugly corners of our towns, it is a good thing, and we wish there were more of it. It is progress under the wrong name.

One of our contributors touched upon the work being done by the patriotic organizations, in preserving the records of brave men gone before; marking historical spots, and, above all else, teaching the children in our schools love of flag and country. The men have been too busy in other directions to attend to these matters, commonly referred to as matters of sentiment. May God protect the country that has none, for its citizens never will.

The social side of women's clubs, is, we believe, at times made too prominent, yet this has its educational aspect. Many a scheme resulting in better civic conditions has had its beginning over the tea-cups. It is also true that some women become so passionately fond of the club idea, that they have developed into chronic "joiners." The men do this, but we expect better things from the women. We believe that club members should see to it that their club life is always second to their more important duties as wives and mothers, and by so doing disarm their opponents, who are as sincere as they, and who fear that present tendencies to over-organization will take away much of the charm of American home-life that has made this country what it is to-day.

The Jewish "Pilgrim's Day"

AN event of world-wide interest was the recent celebration of the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the landing of the Hebrews in America—the Promised Land of the Western Hemisphere. It was truly a fitting occasion for a thanksgiving of the "chosen people." Never, since the culminating disaster which resulted in their wholesale expatriation, have they found such a haven of rest, with such liberal recognition of equal rights before the law, as in this land of ours. Their unexampled growth in numbers, wealth and influence; their uninterrupted peace and prosperity under our flag and Constitution, and their generous acknowledgment of the blessings they have enjoyed, all furnish proof to the civilized world that here, as nowhere else, has the son of Abraham—the "Pilgrim of the Ages"—found an abiding-place and the treatment due to a man and a brother.

It is a new experience for the Jew to have a national Thanksgiving, in the social and secular sense, and for this reason his "Pilgrim's Day," will probably become a fixed and popular annual festival. Israel's first national Thanksgiving was the Passover, and it is still distinguished as the oldest and most important of the three great annual festivals—the others being Pentecost and the Feast of Tabernacles. But there were other periods in Jewish history which stand out pre-eminently as occasions for Thanksgiving, wholly apart from the fixed sacred festivals. The first of these was celebrated at Sinai after the deliverance, and when "the glory of God" appeared upon the mountain. There was another at the consecration of the first Tabernacle in the Wilderness, when God made a covenant with his people. Long afterward, at the erection of the twelve stones at Gilgal—the memorial of the miraculous Jordanic passage—there was still another national Thanksgiving; and again, at the dedication of Solomon's Temple. When good King Hezekiah swept away the idols, cleansed God's house, and restored the true religion, there was another season of great national thanksgiving. These stand out as immemorial landmarks in Israel's history, and are recalled with mingled joy and sadness, in view of the long train of disasters that befell the nation afterward.

The hand of affliction still lies heavily upon the Jew, for in many parts of the Eastern world to-day he is still the burden-bearer of taskmasters as brutal as those of Egypt, the target of opprobrium, and the victim of racial hatred and oppression. Here, in a free land, and as a man among men, he may do much to ease the yoke of his compatriots elsewhere, who are suffering from the ancient antipathy to their nation and religion. And the realization of this beneficent, far-reaching power and influence, is not the least of the blessings that have given zest to the celebration of the new festival, the Jewish "Pilgrim's Day."

An Invitation Worth Heeding

WHAT will be your Christmas gift to the Bowery Mission, which, during the Holiday week, will endeavor to bring a ray of sunshine into the desolate lives of the thirty thousand homeless men and boys of the Bowery, that are diligently walking the streets of New York daily in an honest search for employment?

These men are not resident New Yorkers, for they crowd into the city from every section of the country, under the impression that in the populous and prosperous metropolis, opportunities for work are far more abundant than applicants. They are now learning the lesson, that while there are many promising openings, there are ten times as many seekers. Thoroughly discouraged and disheartened, they would gladly return to parents, wife and home had they the means so to do.

With a little patience and endurance they will ultimately win out. New York assimilates these new comers gradually, and affords them the opportunities they came to seek, but in the meantime they must be housed, fed, and cared for; and, during Christmas week, while their thoughts are with "Home, Sweet Home" and all the loved ones that are tenderly thinking of their absent ones in the far city, something must be done to brighten and cheer their lives, or else they will yield to utter despondency, and, perhaps—God help them—to temptation, for it is only a step from poverty to crime.

The Bowery Mission, the great Gospel Lighthouse on this populous thoroughfare, has, for twenty-seven years, opened wide its hospitable doors on these occasions, and has cordially invited one and all to join in the festive celebration of Christmas and New Year, and the week intervening, within its warm, well-lighted and comfortable quarters.

Twelve hundred men and boys will have a Christmas dinner, with an abundance of good cheer, and a heartier welcome by far than is accorded many a guest at the festive board of boon companions. Seven thousand hot and appetizing breakfasts will be served during the week, and on New Year's Eve more than a thousand will share its hospitality, while listening to the sweet songs of Zion and sympathetic words of sound, helpful and uplifting counsel from the Superintendent, Mr. Hallimond.

On Christmas Day, Mrs. Bird's Christmas tree and Juvenile entertainment will delight the hearts of a thousand and more children of the tenements, and send them home happy that Christ was born, and that the anniversary of his birth affords them the brightest and happiest experience of all the year. How many mittens, warm stockings, skirts and other articles of dress and comfort will be distributed to make the winter's cold more tolerable, and how many dolls will be given to little mothers just aching to put these dear symbols of babyhood into warmer and more comfortable beds than they themselves had ever the good fortune to enjoy! May God bless dear Mother Bird in her efforts to bring happiness into the lives of these the poorest of God's poor.

This is the work we invite you to share with us. You will brighten your own Christmas by contributing your mite. Don't look upon this request as a begging petition, but rather thank us for the opportunity we afford you to have part and parcel in this glorious, God-owned and blessed charity. Give, and give freely—always remembering the blessed words of Holy Scripture: "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye did it unto me;" and "Whoso hath this world's good and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" Again, I say, give, and give freely; for "it is more blessed to give than to receive." Every contribution to this most worthy cause will be acknowledged in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and sooner or later, you will hear it mentioned by lips Divine in heaven above, where all is love, and where sorrow and suffering are unknown. Address THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

Europe Against Turkey

UNDER ordinary circumstances, the appearance at his gates of five warships, representing England, France, Russia, Austria and Italy, would have been a menace to which the Sultan of Turkey would have yielded. Apparently he thought that at this time he was safe in refusing the concessions they were sent to demand. He so far recognized his danger as to send his chief minister to the embassies of the Powers, with an offer of compromise. He was curtly informed that the proposal came too late, and that no answer but one of unequivocal submission would be entertained. His reply was a manifesto, covertly hinting at the probability of a massacre of Christians. He said that the pressure put upon him might excite popular discontent, the consequences arising from which might be such as he could not be responsible for. The Powers disregarded the threat, knowing well that there would be no massacre unless the Sultan himself connived at it. They proceeded to seize the island of Mitylene, which was accomplished peaceably. If the Sultan continues obstinate, it is expected that they will seize Smyrna, a much more important port, from the customs of which he derives a large revenue. Meanwhile, the Macedonian Committee is becoming impatient and is losing faith in the power of Europe to compel the Sultan's submission. The Committee has issued a proclamation declaring that unless the concessions are made and Macedonian finances are placed under the management of Christians, as the Powers require, it will create a situation which will involve a conflict between Turkey and Bulgaria. There is no doubt of the Committee's power to do this, and if it should, the whole Eastern question would be revived in its most acute form. It is, however, still hoped that the misery of such a war will be averted, by the submission of the Sultan. His misgovernment of Macedonia, the oppressions of his corrupt tax-collectors, and the outrageous maladministration of the courts of justice have driven his people to exasperation, and now that they have the support of Europe they are ready for desperate measures.

Surely oppression maketh a wise man mad (Eccles. 7: 7).

The Bosphorus, Scene of the Naval Demonstration Against Turkey

Anarchy in Russia

Reports from all sections of Russia show general unrest and distrust of the government. The mutiny at Sebastopol has shaken public confidence in the loyalty of the navy and the army. Ten of the ships in the Black Sea squadron were the scene of a mutiny, in which the crews seized their officers, ran up the red flag, and elected a lieutenant to the supreme command. Orders were given by the loyal commander to fire on the insurgent vessels. The batteries on the south side of Sebastopol obeyed, but the northern batteries were silent and finally fired on the southern batteries. The sailors on shore began a battle with the loyal regiments, and the mutinous vessels bombarded the city. The carnage is said to have been appalling. Over five thousand were slain on both sides, among them being some of the peaceable inhabitants, who were killed when their houses were battered down by the artillery fire. Finally the mutinous commander was mortally wounded and his chief vessel set on fire. The mutineers then ceased firing and surrendered. By that time half the city had been destroyed and two warships sunk. The loyalty of the regiments which won the victory at Sebastopol is not shared by the regiments at other points. It has been found necessary to arrest and imprison a number of soldiers belonging to the Czar's own life-guards, who were believed to be thoroughly loyal. They had been selected to defend him and his family, on the assurance of Gen. Trepoff that they would be torn in pieces rather than allow harm to reach theirsovereign. The fact that they are suspected of disloyalty has caused a panic, as no one now knows what may occur. The foreign legations have advised all foreigners to leave Russia at once, showing that there is grave apprehension of a general rising. The result has been a run on the banks, which has been increased by Russians themselves, who are transferring their balances to foreign banks, in apprehension of an attack on Russian institutions. Over ten million dollars were withdrawn last week. Never in the history of the country has there been known a condition of disorder and discontent so general or so ominous. The whole of the empire is affected and the oppression of many generations has come to a head. Whether it is possible for even Count Witte to restore order and to satisfy the people seems now doubtful.

By reason of the multitude of oppressions they make the oppressed to cry; they cry out by reason of the arm of the mighty (Job 35: 9).

An Unexpected Ride

Persons on the platform of the railroad at Amsterdam, N. Y., a few days ago, were horrified to see a small boy clinging to the outside of one of the cars of the Empire State Express, as it whizzed by the station. He was holding on to the bars of one of the windows, his feet hanging down near the swiftly revolving wheels. A telegram was immediately sent to the train-dispatcher at Albany, notifying him of the lad's perilous position. He wired to Akin, near which place he calculated the train must then be, to signal the Express to slow down, so that the boy might be caught, if he were still holding on. His orders were obeyed and ready hands snatched the boy from the car as the train passed. It was only just in time. His arms had become stiff and his grasp was beginning to relax. He said he came from Amsterdam, N. Y. He was on the track half a mile from the station when the train stopped, on account of some obstruction, and he, supposing it would stop at the station, caught hold of the bars to ride thither. But to his consternation it did not stop at Amsterdam, but went on toward Utica. He would in all probability have fallen before the train reached that city if he had not been rescued. The experience is one he is not likely to forget. It will be well for him if he learns from it never to embark on any moral course in life the end of which may involve danger to his soul.

There is a way that seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death (Prov. 14: 12).

A Struggle on a Mast

A fierce struggle for life occurred on board a vessel which arrived at Jersey City, N. J., from Porto Rico, recently. The vessel was struck by a heavy storm off Cape Hatteras, and there was serious danger of her being capsized. The wind howled, the sea was roaring and tossing, and the thunder and lightning were appalling. The captain told off some of the crew to go aloft and furl the sails. Each sail, except the topsail, was furled, and the sailors were back on deck, but the topsail still held, imperilling the safety of the vessel. The captain was wondering at the delay, when a cry for help was heard, and he sent up two sailors to investigate. They found the two men who had been assigned to the duty of furling the sail, locked in a life and death struggle on the spar. They were speedily separated, and the sail furled. When the combatants were brought down to the deck, one of them told a thrilling story. He said that the other, a surly Mexican, who had been engaged at Porto Rico to fill a vacancy in the crew, had drawn a knife and attacked him while they were aloft, and he would have been killed if the others had not come to his rescue. It was a strange time and place for a man to choose for such an attack on his comrade. His act might have caused destruction to all on board. He thought more of gratifying his anger than of their safety. Every one would condemn such criminal thoughtlessness, yet how often do we see professing Christians, who ought to know better, spending their time and energy in denouncing one another, while sinners are perishing for lack of Christian effort.

Proud, knowing nothing, but doting about questions and strifes of words, whereof cometh envy, strife, railings, evil surmisings, perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds: from such withdraw thyself (1 Timothy 6: 4, 5).

Wedded with Japanese Rites

The question of the validity of a Japanese marriage rite, was argued before Magistrate Pool, in New York, a few days ago. An Irish woman, of neat, personal appearance, was the plaintiff. She complained that her husband, a Japanese tea merchant, doing business in New York, had deserted her and had married another woman. The defendant's lawyer pleaded that his client had never been married to her by any ceremony that was binding in this country. The woman said that he had told her he had no respect for the American custom, and that he recognized no ceremony but that of Japan as binding. He persuaded her to be married in that way. He made a cup of tea, and, taking a sip of it, said, "Will you be my wife?" He passed it to her and as she took a sip, she answered, "I will." Then she put her hands over the cup, and he put his hands over hers, saying: "The honeysuckle twines about the chrysanthemum, and the fragrance is so sweet they nevermore shall be parted." He assured her that this constituted a legal marriage in his country. They had lived together for seven years, but now he had left her and denied the validity of the ceremony. The magistrate adjourned the case to look up the law, but there is little probability of such a ceremony being recognized by our law as a valid marriage. How easily women are deceived in such matters! Yet how few accept the offer God makes to them!

I will betroth thee unto me forever; yea I will betroth thee unto me in righteousness (Hosea 3: 19).

A Copper Woman

An extraordinary curiosity has been acquired by the American Museum of Natural History. It is that of the body of a woman which is completely covered with copper. It was discovered in an old working of a copper mine in Valparaiso. The head, hands and limbs retain their contour, and are apparently those of a young, well-developed woman in good health. It is conjectured that she must have been caught in a gallery of the mine by some sudden cave-in which effectually imprisoned her. The mining implements by which she was surrounded when found were of the most antiquated description. It is believed from this and other evidence that the cave-in by which she lost her life must have occurred before the time of Pizarro, so that she was immured in that gloomy Chilian dungeon for nearly five hundred years. During that period the natural forces have slowly laid upon her a layer of copper, presenting the spectacle of a mummy perfect in form and feature. It is strange to think that this hard, metallic image was once flesh and blood, perhaps beautiful and beloved. But better that she should be changed in this way than by the vices by which God's ancient people were transformed.

They are all grievous revolters, walking with slanders: they are brass and iron; they are all corrupters (Jer. 6: 28).

ARE WOMEN'S CLUBS HELPFUL?

A Question of Great National Importance Answered by Leading American Women

SO much discussion has been caused by a recent article of Hon. Grover Cleveland, dealing with women's clubs, that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD addressed a number of prominent women, asking them for their views on the subject. Mr. Cleveland said that "Women's clubs, whatever their declared object may be, are apt to pave the way to the reception of woman suffrage radicalism." The replies dealt with various phases of the club movement, but all, in general, agreed that it has been of great help to American women, brightening their lives, giving an intellectual stimulus, to be gained in no other way; and as they improved mentally, they became better wives and mothers, directing the studies and pastimes of their children.

The women's club has become one of the great factors in the social life of this country, and the combined strength of the organizations has accomplished much more through their appeals to the manliness of the other sex, than might have been accomplished by the same number of women armed with the ballot. Not one of the writers has taken the position assumed recently by several critics of the opposite sex.

The question submitted by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was as follows:

Is Club life a help or a hindrance to women? Does it, while it widens their sphere, also ennoble their work and help them as wives and mothers?

The World Needed Women's Clubs

By ANNA L. CLARK.

Humanity called, and this mighty power for good stepped out into the arena against the powers of evil and indifference. By its careful and conservative work it has set the world wondering why it should have been unrecognized so long.

It seems strange to us club women, that our critics pass over and ignore the work we have accomplished, to make a personal attack upon the individual club woman. The same unreasonableness would be manifested, if in the Christian world all the good of Christian activity would be overlooked, and the Christian worker criticized for not keeping the law.

Can any phase of life be a hindrance to a woman which causes her to use her leisure time, her talents, her means, her opportunities in an organized effort to make the waste places blossom as a rose, not only in her own life, but in the lives of others; to strengthen her interest in current affairs and literature that she can become an intelligent helpmeet to her husband and children; to learn to act with an open mind upon the needs of the home; to succor the sorrowing; to watch over the dependent.

All these things, and more, women's clubs do, with no thought of selfish interest in political affiliation or political power, until some great evil in the body politic rears its head, through the greed or negligence of the man voter, to menace the life of the child or of the unprotected. Then this great mother-heart, which has been gaining momentum through all these silent years, steps forth, takes up the burden, and moves on towards the light. Not with strings of influence pulling at her chariot wheels; but with the glad acclaims of those whom she has rescued and made happy, she moves on her triumphal way, not paved with "woman suffrage radicalism," but made smooth by the suffrages of all those who can appreciate the great good that has come by the idealized altruism of women's clubs; while the club woman herself has gained in womanliness and strength of purpose "to do the right as God gives her power to see the right, with malice towards none, charity for all."

Club Movement Does Not Mean Woman Suffrage

By MRS. DIMIES T. S. DENISON

In my opinion, the club as it exists in this country has been of incalculable benefit to women, in developing the spirit of fraternity common to men, and a loyalty to each other, hitherto almost unknown. Personal observation of the homes of club women in almost every State of the Union shows that this broadening of the bounds which custom had set as a limit to woman's kingdom, has in no wise detracted from her devotion to her home and its duties.

If by "the true influence of women" is meant the refining, the gentle, the moral, surely the clubs that by united action support schools, found libraries, protect the interests of children, and everywhere conduct active philanthropies, are extending, yet keeping within their natural field.

There has, as yet, been no indication that the club movement would coalesce with that for universal suffrage. The suffrage movement is the older, and the younger has furnished an outlet for the restlessness of the age. The average club woman is not in favor of woman suffrage. The small mind easily condemns. To the great mind, it should be easy to be just.

Club Life a Help to Women

By EVELYN CLARK MORGAN

In my opinion, club life is a help to women, unless it is carried to the point of dissipation, as is sometimes the case. But the women who throw themselves into club life to that extent would undoubtedly use their vitality injudiciously in dancing, cards, or social functions that exhaust without being of any benefit, whereas club life ennobles and stimulates the intellectual life. I am speaking of literary clubs, and others formed for intellectual improvement or philanthropic objects, rather than those for amusement alone, although the latter have their uses also. Usually a woman comes from her club mentally refreshed and equipped with new ideas to work into her homelife. She has heard the experience of other women, and frequently profits by it to the advantage of her household. For the overtired housewives and mothers the club is a recreation, taking them out of the ruts in the narrow path that many of them are treading.

I have not found that women's clubs lead to the "reception of woman suffrage radicalism," unless that means development along intellectual, philanthropic and patriotic lines.

Helps Women as Wives and Mothers

By ALICE STONE BLACKWELL

Club life, in moderation, is a great help to women. Like any other good thing, it becomes a hindrance when carried to excess.

It broadens women's minds, and anything which does that must "help them as wives and mothers," since a broadminded and intelligent wife or mother is a more ennobling companion than a narrow-minded and ignorant one. As Theodore Roosevelt says (who recommended woman suffrage in his message to the Legislature when Governor of New York): "To be a true mother, a woman must be more than a cross between head nurse and housekeeper."

Women's clubs undoubtedly "pave the way" to a belief in equal suffrage; but so does civic and philanthropic work done by women outside of clubs; so do schools and colleges, and the enlarged opportunities for women in every direction. Col. T. W. Higginson wrote years ago, that when women were allowed to learn the alphabet, it became only a question of time when they would want the ballot.

Bring Higher Ideals Into the Home

By MRS. FREDERIC SCHOFF

President National Congress of Mothers

Club life among women is a development of the last thirty years. No one who has come in touch with the great movement can doubt that it has done much to broaden and develop the women who have gone into it.

The average woman of fifty years ago knew her own narrow circle of friends. She associated principally with those who attended the church of her own faith. She had little to broaden her view of life. Narrow outlook, intolerance, and absorption in petty things was the lot of most women.

The clubs brought together women of every creed. They came to see that there was good in all, and a spirit of charity, tolerance and sympathy has been the result. There has been no stronger factor in bringing about the brotherhood of man and the spirit that we are all children of One Father than the club life and work.

History proves that the desire for study and self-culture animated the club movement in its infancy, and it was composed of women who were mature and whose home cares demanded less of them than formerly. With the study of literature and art, music and history, sociology and civics, a wider outlook on life was gained, and a deeper sense of woman's place and duty in the world life dawned upon her. Clubs where self-culture was the raison d'etre broadened their scope, and the earnest purpose to aid practically in social and civic life was the second step in the evolution of club life. That the purpose has not failed in accomplishment is recorded in the great good done in thousands of clubs all over the land.

They have done much to develop women, to free them from self-consciousness, to take out of their lives gossip and pettiness, to give them breadth of view, and the ability through united effort to accomplish what no individual could ever do.

The Child Study Clubs, Mother's Clubs, Domestic Science Clubs have brought into the home higher ideals of motherhood and better sanitary conditions. Women of wealth and leisure have studied the conditions of working women, and have made them better.

The Woman's Club movement and the suffrage movement are quite distinct. The suffrage question has not entered seriously into the clubs. Some members favor it. Others do not. It is not an issue in club life. Suffrage is a dangerous tool in the hands of the unprincipled, whatever their sex. It is dangerous in the hands of the ignorant, but are the unprincipled and ignorant confined to women? A higher standard of civic duty, a clearer comprehension of the highest type of citizenship should be valuable to the mothers of men, whose formative years are under their guidance and control, and who are largely responsible for the ideals which later guide their lives.

The Federation of Women's Clubs, the National Congress of Mothers and the many organizations of women, are to-day an inestimable power for good in the nation. A spirit of sympathy and co-operation characterizes all of them.

Club Life Makes Woman a Better Mother

By MRS. D. S. STEPHENS

Pres. Associated Clubs, Kansas City, Kan.

By club life we understand the association of women for study and self culture. The generally accepted work in culture clubs of the present time undoubtedly does benefit woman. It enlarges the sphere of her life and sympathies. It rescues her from the narrowness and provincialism of the domestic circle. It puts her in intelligent sympathy with the larger world of life and literature. It makes her a citizen of the commonwealth, as well as a member of the home.

This enlargement of her life helps to the better performance of her domestic duties. It makes her a better mother. Understanding the world of activity in which after awhile her children are to enter, she is in a better position to train them for their future duties.

The awakened interest of women in the sanitary conditions of home, towns and cities, the purity and cleanliness of food roducts, civic pride in environments, all nd to the betterment of home life and he successful rearing of children.

On the whole, the home, as well as ociety in general, will be the better for he enlarged intellectual life that culture ubs secure for women. To attempt to ay the movement that is leading her to rger life and usefulness is as futile as the ttempt to sweep back the ocean's tide ith a broom.

Clubs No Longer An Experiment

By Mrs. George C. Ball

All feminine organizations, whether pa-iotic, literary or charitable, have passed r beyond the experimental stage. Their alue has been proved, by the accomplish-ent of practical work, which could not ave been done so satisfactorily through ther agencies.

To the busy, domestic woman, with intellect worth cultivating, literary ubs have been an inspiration, bringing to her daily life those things requisite nd necessary to constitute her a congenial ompanion for an intellectual husband, nd a guide of the rapidly expanding men-al faculties of her children. The many nsistent daily duties of home life fre-uently induce a neglect of the intellectual evelopment of women.

Patriotic women's societies are more re-ponsible for the present-day stimulation f interest in American history, in American omes, than any other possible agency. he organized efforts of individual women familiarize themselves with the patriotic hievements of individual ancestors, have ecome the incentive to a general, almost niversal, investigation of what was accom-lished by the warriors and statesmen who aid the foundation of this magnificent epublic. These societies have emphasized, in a remarkable degree, the celebration of the significant victories of Revolutionary days, and have also awakened in the public mind an increased reverence for the national flag. Along charitable lines, the effect of organized feminine endeavor has been quite as noteworthy. Every city and town boasts of societies of women banded together in an unselfish desire to improve and ameliorate the condition of the helpless poor. Societies for municipal improvement have turned many an unattractive, cheerless village, into a picturesque town of lovely homes. A few badly balanced, aspiring women, have brought disrepute upon feminine organizations in almost every community, because of an overweening anxiety to advance themselves socially through club connections. They do the cause great damage by a petty vanity and a desire for notoriety, out of keeping with the aspirations of an intellectual, cultivated club woman.

The Alabama State Federation of Women's Clubs has, among other splendid things to its credit, the enactment of "The Child's Labor Bill," which makes illegal the employment of any child under a certain age in the cotton mills of the State. Without the combined efforts of the club and newspaper women of Alabama, this law would never have been enacted. Former President Cleveland's recent assertion that "Women's clubs, whatever their declared object may be, are apt to pave the way to the reception of woman suffrage radicalism," indicates that his knowledge of women's clubs and their history, is exceedingly limited.

Home is Placed First

By Mrs. Emma Shaw Colcleugh

The attitude taken by Mr. Cleveland in regard to women's clubs seems to emphasize the fact that no one, however brilliant, should attempt to write upon a subject unless fully acquainted with all phases of it. To the first clause of your question, I should say decidedly, that club life, if indulged in moderation, helps to broaden the lives of many women. As there is strength in numbers, club women, by their organized effort, can do much altruistic work, and, more than all else, help to create correct public opinion on questions that might possibly not receive the attention of men, unless called to their notice. That the helping hand is rarely lacking when once men become aware that it is needed, I fully believe, and I should regret it exceedingly if the false impression should gain ground, to the effect that clubs, as a rule do not place first, home and its interests. As for paving the way to the radicalism of woman suffrage, it should be remembered, that in many of the club constitutions it is distinctly provided that there shall be no discussion of anything pertaining to politics or religion.

Mrs. Harriet Prescott Spofford

The tendency to club dissipation is belonging to too many organizations, I cannot too earnestly condemn. That, to me, seems the impending peril for many women; but such ones dissipate in church work and in all they undertake.

Club Life Both a Help and a Hindrance

By Mrs. Russell Sage

Club life is both a help and a hindrance to women. It is not altogether true that it helps them as wives and mothers. I do not consider that Hon. Grover Cleveland's recent statement, that "Women's clubs are apt to pave the way to radicalism," as a just estimate of women's clubs is general.

Clubs Have Given a New Joy to Life

By Harriet Prescott Spofford

Club life, so called, is a help to women from every point of view. In the very act of widening their spheres, it ennobles their work as wives and mothers, as sisters and aunts. I doubt if any woman neglects her family or her household duties for the sake of this life. On the contrary, I have observed that women who enjoy the club, spur themselves to meet every domestic obligation in a way beyond reproach.

The class of subjects commanding attention of the clubs, in lectures, study, and discussion, can only so enlarge the mind and nature of mothers, that future generations shall be constantly stronger and nobler. When we reflect that women who have gone mad through the dreary monotony of their confined lives make a large proportion of the inmates of our asylums for the insane, a radical change in their outlook should be a subject of rejoicing, and not of hostility.

A great movement is born only of strong feeling, and words will not prevail against it. The platitudinous criticism, neither of an idle and frivolous woman nor of a gross and narrow-minded man, can arrest the upward advance of the multitude of good and pure and wise women who have felt the dawn stir in the night, and have found a new meaning and a new joy in life.

THE LANDLORD OF THE INN

ney were. One of the homes in the village was presently pened to them, and it was while they were abiding here that the wise men came to offer their gifts of gold nd myrrh and frankincense. Had I needed further vidence as to the wonderful Child, it was furnished in heir story of the Guiding Star."

"And is it true that Herod murdered the children of he village?"

"Quite true. He had conceived an insane jealousy f the Child, who, as he learned, was of the royal line f David. The homes of Bethlehem were filled with the oice of weeping—'Rachel weeping for her children and efusing to be comforted.' I feared that the Christ-child ad perished in the massacre, but Joseph and Mary had been warned and were gone. I saw them no more. I ever saw the Holy Child again. And in view of what afterwards learned, I shall never cease to regret that n that fateful night, when the two weary pilgrims stood t my door, I found no place for them in the inn, for I now now that their Child was the Christ of God."

A hand on the traveler's shoulder awoke him from is revery. The monk stood beside him, saying, "It is he hour of retiring. Will you share the hospitality of our convent for the night?" And consenting, the guest murmured to himself: "How much kinder men are to heir fellows than to the Son of Man!"

In the watches of that wakeful night he meditated hus: "How stands the case with me? Is it better han with the Landlord of the Inn? Had I been there, would the carpenter and the peasant girl have met a warmer welcome? He says he knew them not; but Christ himself has long been knocking at my heart, and I know him. How should I not know him with the Bible at my hand and church bells echoing in my ears? His name has been familiar since I learned it at my mother's knee. The pages of history are full of it. The newspapers thrust it upon me. Oh, I know him—but I do not want him.

"It is Christmas Eve, the waiting night; when they say he stands without and pleads to enter: 'Behold I stand and knock; if any man will open unto me, I will come in and sup with him and he with me.' I wonder, were I to open, what viands he would spread before me? There is a hunger in me that has never been satisfied at the flesh-pots. Would he bring me peace of conscience and peace with God?

"But I do not want him to sup with me. My hospitality is not for guests in homespun. I have seen this Jesus; and he has no form of comeliness. Were he arrayed in purple and fine linen he should find my door on the latch; but there is no beauty in him that I should desire him.

"My heart, morever, is preoccupied. Wealth, pleasure, passion for knowledge and ambition for power are comfortably housed under my roof; and I will not turn them out. There are other guests, too, whose names are not to be blazoned abroad; but they know me, and I know them, and many a merry hour we have passed together. I fear this Jesus and wassail could not abide in the same house. A man must choose; and, to be honest, I choose my nameless guests. Yet, they do weary me at times. I doubt if their fellowship can be a permanent sweetness. Perhaps it would be wise to lend an ear to this importunate caller who still cries: 'Open! and I will come in and sup with thee!'

"I will not, in any case, be ungracious. There is a place nearby—. What! He will not take it? Then must he needs abide without. Yet, it troubles me. I cannot keep him there."

And then he remembered, faintly at first, as something coming from afar, these lines that he had learned in boyhood:

> No room for Him, in whose small hand
> The troubled sea and mighty land
> Lie cradled like a grain of sand!

And the words beat and beat in his brain, like a throbbing pulse: "Immanuel! Immanuel! No room for him—no room for him—." And he found himself, on a sudden, standing by the door of the narrow cell, drawing the bolt, and saying: "Come in, thou blessed One! My heart is an-hungered for thee! Come in, and sup with me!"

Then was the heart of this traveler filled with joy, like a lighted house trimmed with holly and mistletoe. And he slept again and dreamed; and, in his dreams, he heard the voice of minstrels:

> God rest ye, all good people,
> Upon this Christmas morn!
> The God of all good Christians,
> Who'd a manger born
> God rest ye, merry gentlemen,
> Let nothing you dismay!
> For Jesus Christ, your Saviour,
> Was born this Christmas day!

It is the night of Noel: and many a man will drag the Yule-log to his fireside and keep a Christless Christmas. So, long ago, a belated Bethlehemite, going by the stable of the inn, saw a streak of light from a lantern hanging in the doorway fall across his path; and he wondered, and passed on. The path is sin, the light is heaven, the wonder is God's grace, and the story is life.

The night of Noel wears on. There is a voice at the door: the voice of One whose locks are wet with the dews of morning. "Open thy heart, and Christ shall be born within it!"

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL XMAS LESSON

A Prophet's Picture of Christmas

BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

THE Son of God, when he came from heaven to earth, and was born a babe in Bethlehem, was called "Jesus," because an angel had told his mother that should be his name. (Luke 1: 31). But nearly eight hundred years before, God had told the prophet Isaiah that the Son of God would come to live among men, and that his name should be called "Wonderful-Counsellor; God-the Mighty-One; Father-of-Eternity; Prince-of-Peace." These different names were given to him, because of the different ways in which he was to show the love of God for all mankind. God told all these things to the prophet Isaiah so that he might tell them to the Jewish people, among whom he was living. They were wicked and sinful, and God wanted to help them with a great promise. It has been said that "the soul grows rich and strong by feeding in the green pastures of God's promises." And so God gave to the Jews, through the prophet Isaiah, an opportunity for uplift from the darkness of sin into the light of truth.

Illustration and Application

1. The Wonderful Gifts of the Messiah. The three gifts Isaiah names are light and joy and peace. If we had never seen the light what a "good and perfect gift from the Father of lights," it would be seen to be! Such it seems to one born blind who is at last enabled to open his eyes to the light. "Is this heaven?" he exclaims, as he sees for the first time the light of day and his mother's face and the world of beauty about him. How beautiful is every morning after the night! How much more welcome the morning after the six months' night in the icy North! So to a world in the darkness of sin and sorrow and fear and superstition the coming of Christ at Bethlehem was a burst of morning, vocal with the angel song: "Behold I bring you the Gospel, for unto you is born this day a Saviour, who is Messiah-Jehovah."

The rejoicing that took place in the United States when the first trans-continental railroad of America, the Union Pacific, was completed by joining the ends of the two sections, one built from the East, one from the West, is thus described, and applied illustratively to the Christmas story:

"The rejoicing in San Francisco reached the extravagance of a kermess. In the bay the shipping was bright with bunting, and between gayly decorated buildings processions of jubilant citizens marched all day. Grant received the news in the White House; Chicago turned out a parade four miles long; New York was saluting the Pacific coast with salvos of artillery, and Trinity chimes were ringing Old Hundred and Trinity voices were chanting Te Deum when the earliest transcontinental line was finished; and in Philadelphia the old bell rang in Independence Hall. All because a close connection by rail had been established between two parts of a continent. But when Christ came he established a close connection between heaven and earth, between time and eternity. The hosts of heaven celebrated his advent, and the Christian world has been celebrating from that day to this."

Longfellow recalls in Laus Perennis, how the monks of Antioch, in fulfilment of a vow of gratitude, sang praises unceasingly, some of them chanting at every hour of night or day. So he says the whole world has become such a cloister of ceaseless praise to Christ.

> All nations laud the Crucified
> And they and we still sing with you.

"I wish you a Merry Christmas," we say. That, too, was the significance of Isaiah's promise that Christmas should bring to a sin-darkened, sin-saddened, sin-divided world, light and joy and peace. Let us not forget that "joy is a duty." So taught the ancient rabbis. Eight hundred times the Bible exhorts us to rejoice. Strange that some stern Christians have forgotten this even while they sang,

> Serve him with mirth, his praise forth tell,
> Bow ye before him and rejoice.

The parable of the marriage feast is sometimes discussed with total disregard of its main teaching, that a Christian life is a feast of joy. Some churches have on them no sign but the undertaker's, as if the church was only a preparatory school for death. "I have found a new and precious truth in the Bible," said a solemn deacon: "O, Lord, undertake for me." How beautiful the suggestion — "the Lord our undertaker!" In contrast let us recall the Christian woman who said amid many troubles, "When I became a Christian I moved out of Grumble Alley into Thanksgiving Street." A more gladsome, and so more Scriptural religion is manifested in the songs of the Salvation Army; in the Endeavor conventions, that "scatter sunshine" wherever they go; in the Christian athletics of the Y. M. C. A.; and in the Chautauquas, that blend recreation and religion.

Here are three watchwords much needed in the Christmas time to save the young from following counterfeit joys that are but sugar-coated sorrows: "Self-denial is self-love living for the future." "Nothing is true pleasure that is not pleasant to remember." "A good time is one that don't go off with the having." Since we have memories and consciences it does not pay to take a pleasure that is pleasant only in the act, but will be bitter a thousand times in memory. The test of a good time is how it will taste the next morning or the next year. There are no "innocent amusements" for grown-up people, but true recreation is a duty. And duty itself should be a joy. Only in exceptional hours was Jesus "the Man of Sorrows." Often he said, "my joy." We should be able to say to God, as Jesus did, "I delight to do thy will."

The light and joy and peace Christ gives are not for individuals alone. It is coming to be "Peace Day" in many lands, a time for sermons—why not lessons also — in behalf of international peace. The Christian nations through the Christian centuries have lived in "the dawning light that shineth more and more until the perfect day." When the mummies of Pharaohs were discovered, a few years since, holding in their hands fragments of The Book of the Dead, whose words are indeed lifeless and useless, Dr. D. J. Burrell wrote: "Suppose that, from among that imposing company of mummied worthies, a princess had calmly risen with all the ancient dignity of her high station, light in her eyes and unabated strength in her limbs, and had unfolded a scroll, written in our current speech, covering all the progress of the intervening centuries and fully abreast of the spirit of this age." That, he reminds us, is what the Gospel is, a living power, out of which has come the human progress of the nineteen Christian centuries, through which the life of the poor and the weak has been growing ever brighter.

Dr. Thomas Starr King wrote: "Only let the soul believe that God has a plan for humanity, and it can work in peace. It has the great support, then, of a faith that there is a Being who sees dee wider, farther, than the wisest mo eye, and that there is a heart filled an ocean of goodness, that will yet merse humanity."

"There was no room for them in the Inn"

2. The Wonderful Name of Ch Sweetest of the names given to Chris the prophet is, "The Prince of Pea The Norwegians have a beautiful cus for Christmas Eve, setting the shoes the whole family together in front of fireplace, in token of their purpose walk in harmony for the coming year

A poor woman had often sought ear of Philip of Macedon for redress certain wrongs, and always he put off with the excuse that he had no leis to hear her. "No," said the old won at last, "then you are not at leisure to king." Christ is never too busy as K of the World to help the lowliest. T is what he is on the throne for. And every one who bears the name of Chr realize that service is also what he here on earth for. A little boy was m ing mud pies by the roadside. A go lady came along and said, "My little l wouldn't you like to be an angel in hea en?" "No," replied the youngster; would rather be an angel here in t mud." I am glad the song, "I Want Be An Angel" has been outgrown by t world. What we need is not boys w pretend they want to be angels in heav but boys who will be angels of mercy a helpfulness right here on the earth.

A poor woman, crossing one of t public parks, suddenly stopped a picked up something which she conceal in her apron. A policeman saw the a and followed her. She was ragged, a her furtive manner convinced him th she was making off with some article value, such as is frequently dropped b accident in public places. He called t her roughly: "Here, what have you g in your apron?" His threatening offici tone frightened her, and she made n answer. Feeling sure that she had hid den a pocket-book or a jewel, he ordere her to show what she was trying to carr away, or he would arrest her. Then th poor woman timidly unrolled her apron and revealed a handful of broken glass The policeman stared at it a moment and muttered: "What in the world d you want with that rubbish?" "I jus thought I'd take it out of the way of th children's feet," she said meekly.

3. The Wonderful Growth of Christ's Kingdom. What a contrast between Christ as Isaiah anticipated him, or Christ a the shepherds of Bethlehem saw him and the Christ of worldwide fame and love that is the centre of Christmas joys in many lands to-day! And yet more than half the world has hardly heard of him. Let us all tell somebody about the Prince of Peace. The Austrian custom of setting a light in the window on Christmas Eve, that the expected Christ child may have light and welcome, suggests that we shall set a light in the window to help out in the darkness those who are going wrong, knowing Jesus will say, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these, ye did it unto me."

THE CHARIOTS OF THE LORD

A Story of the days of Religious Persecution in England

BY JOSEPH HOCKING

JEFFREYS' eyes gleamed with a greater rage, his face worked with passion, and he showed his large, yellow teeth, just as a savage lion shows his fangs when he is about to spring.

"Ah!" cried Jeffreys, presently. "What have we here? Silence in the court! Ah, I see, we have another traitor, and not only a traitor but a harder one, who has treated his Majesty's court and his Majesty's judges with contempt. One who dares to take exception to my words."

"You told a lie," said the youth; "you have been doing this throughout the whole of this mockery of a trial. I have spoken only the truth."

By this time a breathless silence prevailed; every neck was strained so that a better view might be gained of the youth who dared to beard the man who was a terror to the community. That the public sympathized with him there could be no doubt. He had done only that which nine out of every ten would have done, had they the courage.

"We will see to that," cried Jeffreys, "and we will see, too, whether brawling and bullying can go on without punishment. What is your name?"

At this the youth, whose face had been very pale, flushed, but he did not speak.

"Tell me, thou varlet, tell me quick, or I will have thee cat-o'-nine-tailed here in the court."

"That seems quite possible," said the youth. "Give any beggar a horse and he'll ride it to perdition, and I take it that thou art no exception."

At this Jeffreys' face became purple with passion. Many thought he was meditating attacking the youth in person, but he only cried hoarsely: "Thy name, varlet; thy name!"

At this the youth became again silent, but his eyes did not quail, neither did he show sign of fear.

"Take him!" cried Jeffreys. "Drag him into the streets, tie him to a cart-tail. Strip him; whip him soundly, and afterwards take him to the pillory and command that the offal of London Town be thrown at him. After that clap him into Fleet Prison."

There was a moment's hesitation on the part of the officers; but presently, fearing the anger of Jeffreys, two of them stepped forward to obey. But before they reached the youth, one of the other judges motioned them to stop.

"I tell thee, Jeffreys, it will not do," said one. "This youth doth not belong to the Dangerfield or Oates class. He is a youth of good family."

At this Jeffreys again protested, but was presently checked by one of the other judges, whom he seemed to fear.

"You must tell me your name," said this judge to the youth, "and tell us why you have behaved in this unseemly manner."

"My name is not unknown to you, Lord Huntingdon," said the youth. "The Trelawneys of Cornwall have held a place not inferior to your own in the history of the country. My name is Benedict Trelawney."

"Related to my Lord Bishop of Bristol?"

"He is my uncle."

"But why did you insult the court?"

"I did what no honest man who hath courage could help doing," said the youth, boldly. "He insulted and outraged the feelings of a godly old man, and I could not help but speak."

At this Jeffreys was about to speak again, when someone passed him a letter emblazoned with the royal arms.

"I must e'en leave the court," he said. "His Majesty desires my presence. As for this varlet——" he looked at his brother judges, and then at young Benedict Trelawney, who stood looking at him steadily with a smile on his face—"well, I have not time to deal with him now. Let him be sent to prison till I have the leisure to consider his wickedness."

With that he left the court, but my Lord of Huntingdon called an officer to him and whispered some instructions in his ear.

Without a word, Benedict Trelawney walked away between two officers, while Judge Jeffreys was carried rapidly towards Whitehall. As to the advocates and the spectators, they talked eagerly concerning the young stranger. Some praised his courage, while others shook their heads concerning the fate that awaited him.

"My Lord Jeffreys," said the King, "Have you heard aught of this rumor?"

CHAPTER II.

JUDGE JEFFREYS made his way towards Whitehall with mingled feelings. He was rejoiced that he had been able to send Richard Baxter to gaol, and promised himself that he would be able to wreak his vengeance on many others of a similar persuasion, before many months had passed away, but he was not altogether pleased at the course events had taken. He had desired to see the old divine whipped at the cart-tail. On more than one occasion he had been angered at Baxter's denunciation of unjust judges, and had promised himself that he would make him pay for his words when King Charles' brother ascended the throne; for he knew King James thoroughly, and rejoiced in his ascent. Charles, although he was a weak, sensual and unjust man, did not delight in cruelty. His voice was cheery, and he loved a song and a jest. Jeffreys knew that a man who had a keen sense of humor would not rejoice in extremes.

Thus, while Nonconformists were treated with great injustice during Charles' reign, there were certain of them, among whom was Baxter, whom he treated with thoughtfulness and care. Although he was practically outlawed during the time when the Act of Uniformity was in force, this divine had lived in Acton, where he was able to write his books, and when the Act of Indulgence was passed he was able to return to London, where the King considered him kindly. It was after the Act of Indulgence that Baxter had spoken of the injustices of judges, and Jeffreys believed that he was specially in Baxter's mind. It was for this he bore him a deadly hatred. When James ascended the throne, therefore, he determined to have his revenge. He knew James' character, and he knew, too, that he would have full license to do his worst. It was not of the King, therefore, of whom he was thinking when he consented to a mitigation of the old Puritan's punishment. He was afraid of Lord Huntingdon, and thus had been obliged to yield to his wishes. Nevertheless, this made him more bitter than ever against the man he had sentenced that day.

Moreover, he was disturbed at the outburst of young Benedict Trelawney. How dare he speak against anything he might say or do? He would that very day mention the matter to King James and obtain his sanction to some terrible form of punishment. And yet he did not feel altogether at ease about the matter. Although he was Lord Chief Justice, the willing tool of his king, and possessed of almost unlimited power, there was something in the young man's demeanor that daunted him. The shining black eyes, the scornful smile, the steady, strong voice, and the youthful vigor of the young man made him pause.

He knew that the Trelawney family was among the noblest in England. The Trelawneys had fought for the King's father, even while he, Jeffreys, had declared himself a Roundhead. He knew, too, that Richard Baxter was not the man he had described him to be, and that the desire to whip him at the cart-tail was only to appease his own anger. His bitterness towards Presbyterians was largely to please the King, while the nature of his sentences on them was because he loved to see men writhe with pain, and because he delighted when the people regarded him with terror.

When Jeffreys was ushered into the presence of the King, all his brutal rudeness departed, all his haughty insolence passed away in a moment. But James took little heed of his servility. Indeed, the monarch of but a few weeks seemed much perturbed.

"My Lord Jeffreys," he said, "have you heard aught of this rumor?"

"I pay no heed to rumors, your Majesty," said Jeffreys, "except that when those who start them come before me I quickly shut their mouths."

"Ay, but those I have heard cannot be stopped so easily. These Scotch people have not yet learnt their lesson, it seems. But they shall, they shall. How dare they, after I have expressed my wish, have the temerity to complain?"

"The Scotch have always been rebellious," said Jeffreys. "They are Presbyterians, and a Presbyterian is always a traitor."

"Ay, I think you speak truly. Our brother Louis across the channel hath the same trouble with the Protestants there. And yet have I not sacrificed my own convictions?"

"Of course Scotland is riddled with Presbyterians, your Majesty," said Jeffreys.

"Ay, in truth there seems but naught else there. I have done my best by the aid of the Episcopal bishops, to crush them, but they are as stubborn as pigs. There is a rumor of a rising in Scotland."

"Surely not, your Majesty."

"I have just said so," said the King angrily.

"Send me thither," said Jeffreys. "Let me go to Scotland, supported by

The "Bread Line" of the Unemployed Gathering for the Free Thanksgiving Meal at the Bowery Mission

Thanksgiving at the Old Bowery Mission

THE "BREAD LINE" BREAKFAST AND THE POOR FAMILIES' DINNERS BRING CHEER AND COMFORT TO THOUSANDS

OUR Thanksgiving celebrations began at one o'clock in the morning by the opening of the "Bread Line" breakfast. The "sable mantle of the silent night" had fallen on the city. The households of the happy were hushed, and their contented inmates were sleeping the sleep of the just.

Quickly succeeding as beautiful and mild an autumn time as has been known in many years, came first, a deluge of blinding, soaking rain, and then a drop of twenty or thirty degrees in the temperature, that plunged the metropolis into midwinter at once.

From out the gloomy shadows of the city's slums there came trooping poor, shivering, ill-clad men, to wait for the upturning of the lights and the opening of the doors, that they knew would bring to them, at any rate, a momentary relief from their misery and privation.

Inside, every preparation had been made. The Mission had been thoroughly renovated. In the basement, where the breakfasts are given, the electric lights, the white walls, the toothsome rolls, the aromatic coffee, and, above all, the genial, kind-hearted attendants, were all ready. At ten minutes to one, we knelt down and asked God's blessing on the undertaking. Then the doors were opened.

Down the stairs they came trooping, the same down-hearted, dilapidated throng, that has made our hearts ache for the past three winters. Homeless, friendless, tattered and battered, old and young; men with smashed faces and bandaged heads, men on crutches, men shaking with paralysis, men coughing in the throes of consumption, men who should have been in the hospital, instead of walking the streets, and men, young men, new and uninured to the hardships of a prodigal life. Oh, the pity of it all!

No need to be told they were hungry as well as tired. Their appetites were wolfish, ravenous, terrible. And we are to see this sad, pathetic picture every morning until the dawn of Easter Sunday, 1906.

A few hours passed. At a quarter to nine, Thanksgiving morning, another short time of prayer and the doors were opened again, this time for the poor families coming for their baskets for Thanksgiving dinner. The Mission was soon filled, the baskets—each containing about 40 pounds of provisions, including a good plump chicken—were distributed, with a kindly word of sympathy and cheer.

No sooner was this duty out of the way than the work of filling the boxes for the Thanksgiving dinner was undertaken. About thirty of our young men converts were employed in the task of carving, cutting bread, making sandwiches, sorting fruit, packing the boxes, and placing them ready for the evening meeting. They were an active, hearty, genial, happy throng. Long before the hour for commencing the evening meeting, the Bowery was crowded with men. When the Mission doors were opened it took less than ten minutes to fill every seat and every inch of standing room. Those that were left outside were formed into line by the helpful force of policemen, who had been specially detailed for our benefit, and were marched in orderly fashion into the basement, where they were entertained whilst the regular meeting was in progress.

The meeting was one of the happiest and most successful ever held in the Mission. Mrs. Bird presided, and at once created an atmosphere of homelikeness by her motherly talk. Miss Grace Hildebrand was present to sing, as were also our own popular soloists, Mr. J. T. Hunt and Mr. T. J. Bryant, both converts of the Mission. It was in every respect a happy family gathering. Dr. Louis Klopsch, as president of the Mission, paid us his usual visit, accompanied by Mrs. Klopsch and his eldest son. Dr. Klopsch's address was, as he said himself, a Thanksgiving talk, but one that probably could not have been delivered anywhere else than in the Bowery Mission, because it was so evident that he had come specially to bring a message of cheer to the men who have come to regard him as their own peculiar friend, and who stand so much in need of help and sympathy. Certainly it was an address that captured every heart, and it was received with tumultuous applause.

Dr. Klopsch expressed himself as thankful, in the first place, that he was alive. What were all the benefits of civilization to us if we were dead? No man, however distressed his condition, would care to change places with A. T. Stewart, or C. D. Huntington, or Jay Gould. "While there is life, there is hope." How grateful, then, should we be that we are alive! He was thankful, too, for the Bowery Mission. He considered it one of the greatest days in the history of New York City, when L. P. Tibbals and A. G. Ruliffson knelt at 36 Bowery, twenty-six years ago, and invoked the divine blessing on the work they had undertaken; and he certainly considered it one of the greatest events in his own life, when, fifteen years ago, in Smyrna, in Asia Minor, in a prayer meeting, he heard words from a Bowery Mission convert that had providentially led to his assuming a vital connection and responsibility with this institution. Great cheering greeted Dr. Klopsch's remark, that he would never allow anything to cause him to give up his interest in the Mission.

He then spoke in the highest terms of the work done by Mrs. Bird, and, in closing, urged the men to appreciate and appropriate the blessing that the Bowery Mission was continually bringing them, especially the opportunity it afforded them of obtaining another chance in life. His closing words will long be remembered: "I tell you, men, if you will take this chance to-night, and, by God's help, seek to live a right life, this will be the last Thanksgiving Day in which you will find yourselves in the distressing conditions in which many of you are to-night."

After Dr. Klopsch's address, several beautiful testimonies were given by the men. As far as we were able to judge, not one of our guests was unprovided with a bed, and not one went to bed hungry.

HE KNEW SIR GEORGE WILLIAMS

REV. CHARLES W. KEMP of Venton, Iowa, sends this interesting letter:

"Your account of Sir George Williams, in your issue of the 22d inst, was, perhaps, more interesting to me than to most of your readers. Sir George was born in 1821, in Somersetshire; I was born in 1822, in the adjoining County of Devonshire. He served an apprenticeship to the dry goods (called the drapery business in England); so did I. He succeeded in securing a situation with George Hitchcock & Co., St. Paul's Churchyard, I believe, before Mr. Hitchcock's conversion; I tried to secure a situation there after his conversion, when Mr. Williams was shopwalker. This, I believe, was in 1845 or 1846. Mr. Williams introduced me to Mr. Hitchcock, who, before going to London, called on business at Ludgate House, Barnstaple, Devon, where my uncle, Mr. P. Widlake, was then in business. Mr. Hitchcock asked me why I wanted to become an assistant in his employ? I said because I thought it would be a desirable place for a young Christian. To my surprise he said, 'If you are a Christian young man, you had better try and secure a situation at the East End, where such young men are scarce, and let your light shine in their midst.'

"I was disappointed, but I secured a situation on Kensington Causeway, not far from where Spurgeon's Tabernacle was subsequently built, and not one of the clerks in that large establishment was a Christian, so that I had to 'dare to be a Daniel—dare to stand alone,' and was by the grace of God enabled to do so. In 1849 I became a London City Missionary, and attended a meeting held every morning in the very room where the first meeting of the Y. M. C. A. was held. The meeting was conducted by the Rev. John Branch, Pastor of the Baptist Church, Blackfriar's Road, and special Missionary of the London City Mission. Mr. Williams was the soul of those meetings. Eternity alone will reveal the glorious results of the grand Association organized in the upper room of that justly celebrated establishment.

"You are right; the departure of Sir George Williams is 'A Great Life-work Ended.' He has gone to his reward. It was eminently fitting that the remains of the man whom the good Queen knighted, should be interred near the tombs of the great duke, and the great admiral, in the Cathedral which has been most appropriately called, 'The Monument of Sir Christopher Wren,' just opposite the great store of which he became the honored head."

A "Delightful Surprise"

"The Cruise of the Eight Hundred" arrived safely Saturday afternoon. I sent for it in order to present it to one of the Jerusalem party, and it was a delightful surprise to him. He pronounces the book to be a great success, and it will prove to be a pleasant reminder of the places visited. I wish also to thank you for the generous offer of the book and the paper.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

With the Old Folks

WE are so much in the habit of thinking that Christmas belongs to the children, that we sometimes overlook the dear old people. Not perhaps so much are the old in our own homes neglected, since they are before our eyes, and their feebleness or their loneliness makes its appeal to us. Very likely they are neither feeble nor lonely, but active, full of interest in all that is going on, and quite able to take care of themselves. There are other old people, many of them in the world, who are in great need of sympathy and of an extra pleasure when Christmas comes. The old people who are gathered under the hospitable shelter of homes for aged and indigent men and women, or old ladies' homes. The old people who are in the alms-houses, derelicts swept up like driftwood on the shores of life; the great army of persons who in their youth had brilliant promise, but who, through force of circumstances, have encountered shipwreck; all these should be drawn into the warmth and cheer of the Christmastide.

Presents sent to these old friends need not cost a great deal of money, but there should be about them an individual touch. They should have something to show that they were not bought at haphazard, but were made or selected with some pains in order that they might carry a little heart-warmth and sunshine. If we must make our gifts by proxy we cannot do better than to choose as our almoner a city missionary or a parish visitor, whose beneficent daily task is to go from house to house, from institution to institution, from one little room to another, and to whom these unknown friends of ours are no strangers.

The young never make a greater mistake than in supposing that because the old are somewhat infirm, they have altogether parted with the feelings of desire and satisfaction, hope and longing that once they had. Though the fires may burn low on the hearth, the vital spark is unextinguished so long as breath continues. Long before that period arrives, which, for want of a better name, we call second childhood, old people keep under the mask of wrinkles and gray hairs something of the heart of youth. At Christmas we may as well plan for the entertainment and good cheer of the old.

We should be careful not to duplicate our gifts from year to year. Shawls and felt slippers, it is taken for granted, are always acceptable to an old lady, yet she may have so many of these useful articles that it gives her no special joy to have the stock added to each year by the same hand. So small a thing as a cake of delicate soap and a soft linen towel may carry a good deal of satisfaction to an aged woman whose scanty means leave no margin for luxury. In bestowing gifts upon the old let the first, last, and middle design be to make the receivers happier, if only for the space of a single day.

Pass Them Along

Many of the children who read this paper possess picture cards or postals, for which they have ceased to care. They accumulate as do the pretty leaflets and booklets which come at certain periods of the year, such as Christmas and Easter, and after a while they are thrown away. Yet, they would be regarded as boons at nearly all our foreign mission stations, and our home missionaries on the frontier, or in the mountains of the South, could make excellent use of them. The little mountain children in our own land, the Indian children in the West, the children in India, Syria and China are made very happy when picture cards are given them. They receive and hoard them as treasures. Pass them along, if you have them, and never throw away so much as a scrap of paper which can carry joy to another home.

THE EMBROIDERY LESSON

Grandma so kindly is showing
Little Mary a stitch so fine,
While two other girls are striving
To follow each curving line.

Sister Sue at the window is standing,
And heeds not a word that is said,
As she dreams of a gown richly bordered
She'll wear on the day she is wed.

A City's Contrasts

In a great city like New York there are contrasts so marked, and groups of people in such amazing contrast, that, looking over the vast concourse, one gets a new view of humanity, and a new thought of God. Teeming with life are the foreign quarters; street after street crowded with a seething mass of people, whose languages and bearing are of the alien type. They may be Italian, Norwegian, Dane, German, Polish, Russian, Syrian, Chinese, or whatever else the prevalent immigration in that particular locality has brought to find a new home there. The exiles are gregarious, and like to dwell together. Their children in the public schools will be fused in American sentiments of patriotism, and become good citizens of the Republic. The second generation is soon Americanized, and the third will be intensely devoted to our flag, and oblivious to the fact that its ancestors fought or suffered under any other.

In the social settlements, which are aiding the public schools in their work of beneficence to foreign-born children, we discover great possibilities in the young men and boys, as in the young girls. They enter with eager zest and quick intelligence into debates on ethical and civic subjects, and they are athirst for knowledge, coming evening after evening when their day's work is over, to sit around a table and study arithmetic, geography, science, literature; to get onward mentally, and to be better equipped for the struggle before them.

A few blocks off from the quarters where the poor are closely hived, in rooms like cells, here in our great town, are the splendid mansions of wealth. Except in old Rome in her palmy days there has been no parallel to the luxury which is the portion of rich Americans, who simply go where they choose, buy what they want, and spend life in a dream of ease. A cosmopolitan city is a place of contrasts, but above rich and poor watches the same Father, and when mortal life is ended neither poor nor rich needs more than six feet of earth.

Current Fashions

ONCE in a while fashion takes a backward turn toward barbarism. Our pretty girls, and our stylish women are very generally adorning their hats this winter with birds and birds' wings, and the fashions in furs to any lover of animals are simply hideous. How a gentle, refined, and amiable woman can bear to wear around her neck a boa finished with the head of some little murdered animal, or can slip her hands into a muff, on the front of which another pathetic head is shown, passes the comprehension of those who have a regard for the lower creation. There must be a good deal of latent cruelty and savagery in the breasts of women when they can persuade themselves for the sake of what they fancy is ornamental, to make themselves walking illustrations of an unfeeling, capricious, and shocking barbarity.

Doubtless we shall always wear furs, and to make our fur coats and capes blood must be shed. Equally, animal life is sacrificed that we may have roast beef and roast fowl on our tables. These are necessities, but there is no necessity, as there is no taste, in flaunting before our eyes the fact that beasts were killed that we might be comfortable. For the wearing of dead birds on women's bonnets there is not the very slightest excuse. Ribbons and flowers trim hats quite as beautifully as do feathers, wings, and breasts of birds, and no objection can ever be made to feminine headgear thus adorned.

A Song of Christmas

SING a song of Christmas!
Bare the mistletoe,
Where, with laugh and laughter
Merry maidens go.

Sing a song of Christmas!
Holly berries show
'Mid the spicy fragrance
Of cedar and of pine.

Deck with green the temple,
Myrtle, box and bays—
Type of life unfading
Of this feast of days.

Trim the glowing fireside,
Heap the hearth with cheer
For the merry Christmas
Comes but once a year.

Sing a song of Christmas!
Let thy carol be free
Fury not in denial
From this day's jubilee.

Sing a song of Christmas!
Of the Blessed Child
Cradled in the manger
In the winter wild.

With the song of Christmas
Let the glad earth rend
"Glory in the highest!"
"To men peace and good-will!"

Dr. O'Hanlon's Question Box

Growing Interest in the Novel Feature at the Bowery Mission Sunday Meetings

THE unique Bible Question Class established by the Rev. Thomas O'Hanlon, D.D., at the Bowery Mission, Sunday afternoon, is rapidly becoming a feature of intense interest, not only in New York, but throughout the country. Questions pour in upon the good doctor by mail, from a dozen different quarters at once; but even these are as nothing in number contrasted with the questions that are thrust at him by those who attend the meetings, at three o'clock, on every Sunday afternoon in the Mission Hall, 55 Bowery. This novel method of interrogation has become extremely popular with the audiences that assemble to listen to Dr. O'Hanlon, and who are greatly edified and helped by his able, wise and orthodox handling of the many problems submitted.

Dr. O'Hanlon would welcome at these meetings any readers of this journal living in New York or vicinity, or who may be visiting the metropolis. The meetings are held at 3 P. M. Sundays. Any one who so desires has the privilege of submitting a question during the meeting.

We give below several of the questions and replies from the last meeting:

9 Is the life which animates each one of us the Spirit of God, or is that Spirit another life distinct in itself?

Man has a body—an animal life; has also a soul or spirit—in the image or likeness of God (Gen. 1:27); hence a spiritual life. The Holy Spirit animates and inspires the soul-life of man, not the animal life.

10 Why should I be held responsible for anything, when I was brought into this world without any desire or option on my own part; in fact having often wished that I had never been born?

God's richest gift to man is life—"made only a little lower than the angels, he is crowned with glory and honor," in the very fact of his creation. If man by his own misconduct, makes his life miserable and wretched, he himself is to blame and not his Creator.

11 Do not certain so-called Christians seize upon that passage in the Bible which calls on all Christians to forgive their fellow beings — seventy-seven times seven, as a loophole whereby they can play hide-and-seek with God, times without number — and should these brethren have the privilege of being placed on an equal footing with the faithful servants of God? Lots of men claiming to be converts fall away or backslide and return to the fold fifty times a year; they take advantage of the above.

Yes; some may do so. There are some black sheep in every large flock. Let us rather believe that the poor men who fall away so often do it through weakness and not of purpose, and let us still have charity for them.

12 Is it possible to forget, even after accepting Christ, or will remorse follow us forever?

No. We cannot forget the past. While we live, the remembrance of the evil that we have done will be unpleasant and even sometimes painful, for even abundant pardon for the wrong-doings cannot blot out the memory of them in this life; but it may be that in the life to come, the fullness of heaven's abounding joys shall exclude from memory everything that would in the least degree disturb that peace with God which passeth all understanding.

13 What condition is a man in when he has no desire for prayer or the better life?

He is impenitent. Have you no sorrow for sin? Are you sorry that you have no sorrow for sin? If you are sorry, and will earnestly pray for forgiveness, God will hear your prayer.

14 Our pastor said we all have to die. I say no, for my reason is, that if Gabriel blew the trumpet ten minutes after you read this, we would all be bound to arise and go to judgment just as we are. Am I right?

Yes. I Cor. 15: 51, 52: "Behold, I shew you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed."

15 Is it necessary for us to pray for our dead?

No. The Scripture gives us no authority for such prayers; but, on the contrary, teaches that there is no place for repentance beyond the grave.

16 How is it that Protestant churches don't believe in the Virgin Mary, the mother of Christ?

Protestants have great veneration for the Virgin Mary. They believe her to be pre-eminently the queen of all women, and especially of all mothers; but that Christ alone is our intercessor at the right hand of God.

17 Do you believe in a literal hell fire?

No. It is used in the teachings of our Lord, figuratively, to portray the awful calamity that comes to the lost soul in the world to come.

18 Which is the surest way to win God's love back again? I was a saved man one time, but I have fallen by the wayside.

Only one way—the way in which you first found the mercy of God—by piety, repentance towards God, and faith in and confession of Jesus Christ. Your heavenly Father is waiting for you to come back. Why do you delay?

19 If a drunkard is converted, is he as good a man in the sight of God as the purest man that never drank?

He is as innocent and as freely justified before God as the most holy of men, but the loss of character and of a noble life-work can never be made up to him.

20 If a man is converted and begins a Christian life, what of those against whom he has sinned, and who, because of him and his former sins, are still living a sinful life?

If the converted man does all that is possible to make amends for the wrongs he has done to others, as a consequence of divine forgiveness, he shall not be punished for their wrongs, but he will never be as happy as he would be, had he never inflicted these wrongs.

21 Will you please tell me, if God is unchangeable, how it is that prayer can change him?

God is unchangeable in his nature and character, but it is his nature and character to answer prayer; therefore He can answer prayer and still be unchangeable—"the same yesterday, to-day and forever."

22 If a man dies in the honest belief that there is no God, or that Christ was not divine, or that there is no hell, etc., will you tell me if God will damn that man?

If a man lives and dies as an idiot because he was born so, he will not be responsible to God nor man; "but that servant that knew his Lord's will (or might have known it if he wished to know it), and did it not, shall be beaten with many stripes."

Home Made

Have your cake, muffins, and tea biscuit home-made. They will be fresher, cleaner, more tasty and wholesome.

Royal Baking Powder helps the housewife to produce at home, quickly and economically, fine and tasty cake, the raised hot-biscuit, puddings, the frosted layer-cake, crisp cookies, crullers, crusts and muffins, with which the ready-made food found at the bake-shop or grocery does not compare.

Royal is the greatest of bake-day helps.

Will The Watch You Carry Stand a Test Like This?

A South Bend Watch Keeps Perfect Time in a Boiling Temperature

Before an Adjusted South Bend Watch is offered for sale—before it is ever allowed to leave the factory, it must stand successfully a series of tests so severe that no condition under which a watch is ever placed in ordinary use will effect its time-keeping qualities in the least. No violent change of temperature with which it might meet would be one-half so severe as these tests, and the fact that a South Bend Watch is adjusted to meet such strains renders the assurance of its accuracy at all times doubly certain.

You might, after properly sealing the case, submit a South Bend Watch to a boiling temperature or freeze it solid in a cake of ice and it would still keep perfect time — chronometer time — under all such tests.

Every South Bend Watch is baked in an oven heated to 100 degees Fahrenheit; it is kept for hours in a refrigerator and must not loose or gain time even in the slightest degree. The wonderful South Bend Balance Wheel perfectly adjusts the watch even to such great changes in temperature.

Not only is a South Bend Watch adjusted to temperature changes, but it must also keep perfect time in every position and not be affected by the jars and jolts of railway trains, horseback riding, automobiling, etc. We guarantee them to be perfect time-keepers.

South Bend Watches cost more to make than any other watches selling for the same price, but we are repaid for the extra cost of manufacture by the knowledge that no better watches than South Bend Watches can be made at any cost.

South Bend Watches are sold only by reliable jewelers. You can get them nowhere else. If your jeweler does not sell them, send us his name and we will mail you an interesting book, "How Good Watches are Made" and also a little device illustrating the manner in which our watches adjust themselves to every temperature.

The Women's National League

THE National League of Women's Organizations has received a contribution of two dimes sewed up in muslin, and mailed to the treasurer. This touching gift is regarded as an evidence of the deep interest of the plain, home-loving people of this country in the work that is being done to save our country from the law-defiant practices that are being promulgated by the polygamous Mormon hierarchy. If every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would follow the example of this woman who contributed her mite to aid those who are fighting against this evil, there would be ample funds to do all that is required.

The work that is being done to secure the keeping of the pledges given to the government whereby plural marriages were forever prohibited, and the Mormon Church was commanded not to interfere in politics, is one that affects every citizen of our land. The fight is not for the good of a few; it is for the benefit of all. Every true-hearted, pure-minded, patriotic citizen should be glad to aid those who have undertaken this great work. The National League asks every reader who is in sympathy with the effort that is being made to free our country from the stain which has so long been a blot upon it, to follow this woman's example and send one dime or two dimes, to the treasurer, Mrs. Teunis S. Hamlin, 1316 Connecticut Avenue, Washington, D. C.

A BRAIN WORKER

Must Have the Kind of Food That Nourishes Brain.

"I am a literary man whose nervous energy is a great part of my stock in trade, and ordinarily I have little patience with breakfast foods and the extravagant claims made of them. But I cannot withhold my acknowledgment of the debt that I owe to Grape-Nuts food.

"I discovered long ago that the very bulkiness of the ordinary diet was not calculated to give one a clear head, the power of sustained, accurate thinking. I always felt heavy and sluggish in mind as well as body after eating the ordinary meal, which diverted the blood from the brain to the digestive apparatus.

"I tried foods easy of digestion, but found them usually deficient in nutriment. I experimented with many breakfast foods, and they too proved unsatisfactory till I reached Grape-Nuts. And then the problem was solved.

"Grape-Nuts agreed with me perfectly from the beginning, satisfying my hunger and supplying the nutriment that so many other prepared foods lack.

"I had not been using it very long before I found that I was turning out an unusual quantity and quality of work. Continued use has demonstrated to my entire satisfaction that Grape-Nuts food contains all the elements needed by the brain and nervous system of the hard working public writer." Watches for Men Women and Children

Readers of The Christian Herald are asked to realize that an accurate watch is not a heavy investment to-day.

The function of a watch is to keep time. It cannot do less and be a real watch. No watch can do more except to fill the place of a piece of jewelry.

Numbers of our foremost men are adopting the Ingersoll. They are abreast of the day and they recognize that it does all that any watch can do for them.

Looking at the subject purely as an investment, cold reason, common sense and true economy dictate their choice.

Ingersoll Watches are sold by merchants in every town and city, or the latest models postpaid by the makers. They are absolutely guaranteed.

For the sake of a few cents extra profit some dealers offer a substitute which is not a watch because it does not keep time. Look for INGERSOLL on the dial.

Don't "Stand" For Substitution

Ingersoll Watches

Ingersoll Watches sell at 1.00, 1.50, 1.75 and 2.00. The movements in all are the same.

As timekeepers they are equally reliable. The Dollar Watch, the Eclipse (1.50), and the Triumph (1.75) are regular modern size models. The Eclipse is stemwind and stemset and is in a solid German-silver case. The Triumph is heavily silver plated. All are made also in Gold-plate and Gunmetal finishes.

The Midget is our new ladies' size model. It is stemwind and stemset and is regular six-size. It is the greatest watch for girls and small boys, too. Price $2.00.

Sold by dealers everywhere or postpaid by us. Booklet Free.

The INGERSOLL Dollar Chains

Made in 12 attractive patterns and every one guaranteed to contain more gold than any chain you can buy for $2.00. Also guaranteed to give satisfaction.

Questions and Answers

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD invites the managers of missionary and charitable enterprises, who feel entitled to recognition when financial apportionments are under consideration, to send full description of their work, together with list of references and such printed matter as may be at their disposal, to "Charity Department," THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City. Communications thus addressed should be STRICTLY CONFINED to the information herein called for.

P. G., Webster, Mass. Where was Cyrus Field born, and when did he succeed in laying the first Atlantic cable?

He was born in Stockbridge, Mass., in 1819. He went to New York and became a prominent merchant. Becoming interested in the scheme of a cable to Europe, he was joined by Peter Cooper, Moses Taylor, and others, and after crossing the ocean thirty times, succeeded in laying the first cable in 1858, but it was not until 1865 that it was in good working order.

Sarah H., Salem, Mass. Where was the first Sunday School established, and under what circumstances was it formed?

The modern Sunday School dates back to 1780, in which year Robert Raikes, of Gloucester, England, began to gather together children from the streets, and paid teachers to instruct them in religious knowledge. His example resulted in the forming of other schools, and finally a society was formed for the establishment and maintenance in all parts of the United Kingdom. In 1803 the Sunday School Union was formed.

W. H., Deerfield. How many soldiers were there in the ancient Macedonian phalanx?

There were 16,384 hoplites, or heavy armed soldiers. They were drawn up in section lines. There were four grand subdivisions, again divided into brigades and battalions, and these into companies, sixteen deep, sixteen men front and sixteen deep, making a perfect square.

A. S., Richfield Springs. What is potstone?

It is a mineral formed of a mixture of talc and chlorite. It is of a grayish green color. It is soft when newly dug up, greasy to the touch and infusible. It was used much in ancient times for making vessels. It is found in Norway, Sweden, Greenland, and in the country about Hudson's Bay, Italy and Egypt.

M. S. K. E., East Aurora, N. Y. Do the saints in heaven know what the saints on earth are doing? Do they know of their sufferings? Do they know also of their joys? Have we Scripture to prove that they do?

There is every reason to believe that memory will continue active in a future state. If it were otherwise, then all the lessons learned in our present existence would be practically lost. Even the memory of our redemption would be a thing forgotten; but we shall hear in heaven, the Bible tells us, the song of the redeemed. Christ, in the parable of Dives (Luke 16: 25), clearly shows that memory of this life is not forgotten in the next. See also Revelations 6: 9, 10, where the cry of the martyrs for cruelties done to the saints on earth rises to the Lord. Paul, in Rom. 14: 12, says, "every one shall give account of himself to God," which implies a perfect memory. In Hebrews 13: 17, he says of ministers and those in spiritual authority that they "watch for your souls as they that must give account," which most commentators interpret as implying an absolute belief in heavenly recognition, as these ministers would both remember and recognize their flock. In Hebrews 12: 1, the famous passage occurs which shows how clearly the early Christians believed in the redeemed having full knowledge of what was passing on earth. Augustine, Neander, Cyprian, Ambrose, and all the early fathers, held full belief in heavenly cognizance and recognition.

R. W. R., Jewett, O. Would it not be a Christian act for the United States to extend an invitation to the Russian Jews to come to America, where they might at least live in peace? We have millions of acres of undeveloped land in our Western States and Territories, where they might locate, and be a benefit to the country as well as receive benefits temporally, morally and spiritually.

They are coming here by the thousands, almost as fast as they can get permission to leave Russia. To extend any special invitation to any particular race or nationality seems unnecessary. We have always given a welcome to the oppressed of any land. All are free to come, if they can comply with our immigration laws.

K. N., Wonoka, Oklahoma. Where is the body of Paul Jones, the famous admiral, buried?

It has been placed in a temporary brick vault, on the grounds of the Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md. Later it will be transferred to the new chapel, which is now being constructed, one of the finest buildings of its kind in the world. The bodies of other naval heroes will also be placed within its walls.

A. M. In a recent number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the writer of a story about life in Mexico refers to the motormen taking off their hats whenever they pass a church. I have seen men in New York take off their hats when they pass St. Patrick's Cathedral. Can you tell me why they do it?

Both do it for the same obvious reason, viz: to show their reverence for religion and the church. The same thing has been observed in Italy and Spain, though not among motormen.

L. A. T., Westminster, S. C. Who is that "friend" spoken of in the Bible that "sticketh closer than a brother?"

In the Hebrew, the word "friend" is one of degree. Thus reehim, meaning companions or associates, is employed in the opening phrase of the verse, "a man that hath friends," etc.; while in the last part of the same verse, the word aheeb is used, meaning a loving friend, one who loves us so sincerely that he will do much for us, even more than our own kindred. W., Charlotte, N. C. If one person accuses another of doing or saying spiteful things, and makes others believe it, what is the right course to pursue to make amends? Should the accuser say to the accused, "If I have done anything to displease you, I beg your pardon," or should he say, "I know I have accused you wrongly and I am sorry?" Would the accused be entirely exonerated in the opinion of others, if the accuser does not confess to them that he falsely accused the other?

A full and frank admission to the person njured is the proper way of undoing the rong. There should be no hedging—no incing of terms. Just say you did wrong nd are sorry for it, and ask the injured ne to forgive it.

nquirer, Cleveland, O. Where can I find out about bronze and other monuments? Which is the most desirable: stone, marble or bronze?

There are three kinds, viz.: Granite, arble and white bronze. Many favor the atter, which is made by the Monumental ronze Company, Bridgeport, Conn.

I. H. B., Brockport, Ill. Are there more saloons than churches in New York City?

According to the World Almanac, there re 2,710 hotels licensed to sell liquor, and 7,827 saloons and clubs holding licenses. There are 1,135 Protestant and Roman Catholic Churches in the five Boroughs of Manhattan, Brooklyn, Queens, Richmond and the Bronx.

Mrs. M. A. T., Becket, Mass. Is it right to omit the Sunday service and have Christmas exercises, speaking, singing carols, and giving out the presents instead, with the tree and all in the church? Also, is it not out of place to have the Christmas tree in the daytime?

Most churches hold the Christmas festival gathering and distribution on a week-day evening, and make the Sunday Christmas service quite separate. We believe this is the better plan. It is certainly out of place and unusual to hold the distribution on Sunday.

Several readers have requested us to suggest the form of a letter to be sent to their United States Senators, urging them to vote in favor of the anti-polygamy amendment and for the exclusion of the Mormon Senator. We cannot do better than print for their benefit the following letter, which has been sent by Mississippi readers:

MAIN STREET METHODIST EPIS. CHURCH, SOUTH, BILOXI, MISS., November 23.

Honorable A. J. McLaurin, United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

ESTEEMED SIR—At the request of many ladies of this city who have signed a petition to the United States Senate, which has been forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, desiring action by your honorable body against the seating of the Mormon Elder Smoot as a Senator from Utah, I, as pastor of one of the most influential churches of this section of our State, urge that you give your vote against Mr. Smoot's reception into the body of our distinguished and esteemed Senators, and that you use your extensive influence with the other honorable Senators to prevent the disgrace of a Mormon being one of our law-makers.

Thanking you in advance, in the name of numbers of our best women of Biloxi, for what I feel assured will have your hearty compliance, I am, etc., D. L. MITCHEL, Pastor.

S. J. P., Salem, N. J. Please give the origin of the phrase "pin money"?

For some time after pins were invented in the fourteenth century they were very dear, and the maker was allowed to sell them in open shop only on Jan. 1 and 2. The court ladies and rich dames flocked to buy them, having first been provided with "pin money" by their husbands. When pins became cheaper, the ladies spent their allowance otherwise, but the term "pin money" continued to be used.

Miscellaneous

D. S., Paris, Ills. Tell Miss K., of Manitou, Okla., that the song "The Bird With a Broken Wing" is found in the hymnal "Crowning Glory," used by Dr. Chapman and his singer, P. P. Bilhorn.

A. S., Greenwich, N. Y. There are, doubtless, many physicians who prescribe alcohol, but we believe the general tendency, even in the medical profession, is to regard it as unnecessary, and in most cases even detrimental to recovery.

C. W., Troy, Tenn. The question of the marriage of cousins has repeatedly been discussed in THE MAIL BAG. It is not expressly prohibited in Scripture, but the Church and the general opinion of enlightened society have opposed such unions as unwise. The offspring of such marriages is apt to be degenerate physically and intellectually.

Premiums That Always Please

The beautiful book, "The Cruise of the Eight Hundred," and Calendar, have both arrived in good condition. Please accept my warmest thanks for the same. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD premiums are always lovely, and you are to be congratulated that this year they are keeping up the enviable reputation they have so long held, and the dear old paper grows better and brighter as the years go on.

THE "COFFEE HEART"

It Is as Dangerous as the Tobacco or Whisky Heart

"Coffee heart" is common to many coffee users and is liable to send the owner to his or her long home if the drug is persisted in. You can run 30 or 40 yards and find out if your heart is troubled. A lady who was once a victim of the "coffee heart" writes from Oregon:

"I have been a habitual user of coffee all my life and have suffered very much in recent years from ailments which I became satisfied were directly due to the poison in the beverage, such as torpid liver and indigestion, which in turn made my complexion blotchy and muddy.

"Then my heart became affected. It would beat most rapidly just after I drank my coffee, and go below normal as the coffee effect wore off. Sometimes my pulse would go as high as 137 beats to the minute. My family were greatly alarmed at my condition and at last mother persuaded me to begin the use of Postum Food Coffee.

"I gave up the old coffee entirely and absolutely, and made Postum my sole table beverage. This was 6 months ago, and all my ills, the indigestion, inactive liver and rickety heart action, have passed away, and my complexion has become clear and natural. The improvement set in very soon after I made the change, just as soon as the coffee poison had time to work out of my system.

"My husband has also been greatly benefited by the use of Postum, and we find that a simple breakfast with Postum is as satisfying and more strengthening than the old heavier meal we used to have with the other kind of coffee." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There's a reason. Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Why an Ostermoor is More Comfortable than a Hair Mattress

Comfort in a mattress is in reality a matter of conformation to the form of the body.

Lie on your side on a board—your body touches at shoulder, thigh, calf and ankle. If you weigh 150 pounds and your body rests upon 75 square inches of surface, then the pressure on those parts is 2 pounds to the square inch.

Lie on your side on an Ostermoor. It conforms to every curve—fits the body. Your weight is distributed over 500 square inches of surface—only 5 ounces pressure to the square inch—that is comfort.

Between the extremes of the board and the Ostermoor comes the hair mattress; sometimes fairly elastic at first, but soon packing down into a hard, non-conforming mat.

The Ostermoor retains its original unique elasticity for over 20 years—as we have testimonials to prove.

There are Now Two Ways to Buy the Ostermoor

FROM YOUR DEALER AT HOME or FROM US BY MAIL

To protect the public from worthless substitutes, exclusive agencies are being established with high-grade merchants in every town and city—so far about 2000 local firms sell the "Ostermoor." Our name and trade-mark label are sewn on the end so that you cannot be deceived.

We make no mattress that does not bear the name "Ostermoor" and our trade-mark.

Before buying, first write to us for our handsome 136-page book, "The Test of Time," and the name of the dealer in your place who sells the genuine Ostermoor. Beware of the "just-as-goods."

Where we have no dealer we sell by mail. Sleep one thirty nights and if it is not even all you have hoped for, if you don't believe it to be the equal of any $50 hair mattress ever made you can get your money back by return mail. Mattress sent by express prepaid same day letter is received. To learn the Ostermoor story, send for our

Old Dutch Cleanser

Chases Dirt

A chisel, sandpaper or scouring-brick is good to remove a hard mass from a surface—but—be careful not to dig or scratch that surface.

OLD DUTCH CLEANSER
CLEANS

—never distributes dirt as a dirt-gathering brick must, but is always pure—taken from a protected "sifting-top" can—and, Being Highly Porous, ABSORBS DIRT.

OLD DUTCH CLEANSER
SCRUBS

—doesn't waste by breaking up, as a cake will when worn thin. Sprinkle out the exact quantity required, and use the powder to the last bit.

OLD DUTCH CLEANSER
SCOURS

—cannot scratch like a grit-brick or eat like a lye or caustic powder because it does not contain these elements. Old Dutch Cleanser is a porous mineral combined with vegetable oil.

OLD DUTCH CLEANSER
POLISHES

—because of the rounded surfaces of its particles it quickly restores original lustre to the article cleaned, which a gritty, non-absorbent powder cannot do. No cleaner does so much with so little labor and cost, and, at any cost, none can do it so well. Home-makers should secure it at any cost of effort.

a sufficiently strong force, and I will e'en play such havoc among those canting Presbyterians, that there shall not be one left in a year."

The King lifted his head and looked steadily at Jeffreys. For a moment his eyes became brighter as though he were pleased with the thought of Jeffreys' suggestion, but a moment later a lowering look came upon his face.

"Ay, my Lord Jeffreys," he said sourly, "I know something of your power in that direction. The man who used to frighten faithful Catholics by threatening them that he would have them disemboweled and a part of their own bodies burnt before their eyes, would doubtless delight in torturing Presbyterians."

"That was while I was in the gall of bitterness," said Jeffreys sanctimoniously. "I did not know your Majesty then, neither were my eyes opened. Since your Majesty hath come to the throne, and I have listened to your arguments for the Holy Roman Catholic Church, I have been much shaken in my faith concerning the Protestant religion."

The King's eyes flashed again. Nothing pleased him more than to win a pervert to his faith, no matter what might be the motive of the perversion. But presently he became doubtful.

"That thou will eventually be converted to the true faith I doubt not," he said; "but if thou art, it must not be known. Thou canst do my work better as a Protestant. I remember that I have sworn to reign over this country as a Protestant, even while I am of the true faith, therefore, it will be best that the Lord Chief Justice should be known as a zealous Protestant."

"Doubtless your Majesty is right," said Jeffreys, with fawning bows."

"I will not send you to Scotland for the present," said the King, "for I have heard that Monmouth is meditating a raid upon our shores, and men have it that he will land in Somersetshire."

"Surely this cannot be," said Jeffreys.

"Have I not said that it is so," said the King angrily.

"Your Majesty mistakes my badly spoken words," said Jeffreys. "Doubtless you have been informed of this; but what I doubt is that any man, much less the late King's own son, could think of taking up arms against your sacred Majesty."

"What would not Monmouth do?" snarled James. "He is the child of Lucy Walters, and hath all his mother's evil nature. He pretends to be a Protestant, and from what I have heard, many are persuading him to land in Somersetshire, where there is much disaffection towards the throne."

"The West is eaten out by dissent," said Jeffreys. "Every other man is a canting Presbyterian, or an Independent, or a Baptist. They have no respect for your Majesty's sacred person. They do not believe in the divine right of kings. Even to-day I have had proof of that."

"In what way?" asked the King.

"I have had before me that old treason-monger, Richard Baxter, the Presbyterian. I have convicted him because of his seditious books."

"Richard Baxter!" said James. "Was it not he to whom my brother Charles offered a mitre?"

"The same," replied Jeffreys, "and his counsel actually had the audacity to mention the fact in his defense today. But I quieted them, by the grace of God I quieted them. I have sent Baxter to King's Bench Prison for eighteen months."

"Is that all?" asked the King sourly.

"Ay, that is all. I would have given him five years besides the hangman's lash every month, but in a moment of weakness I allowed myself to be persuaded by brethren on the Bench. But the end is not yet. What is not done to-day can be done to-morrow."

The King smiled, but did not speak for some time. Then he said, "I did not expect moments of weakness from my Chief Justice."

"And you shall not see them in aught that concerns you. Have I not already given proof of my loyalty?"

"Yes," said the King, "thou hast been a faithful servant, Jeffreys. And I know how to honor a faithful servant."

"I desire naught but to be your Majesty's devoted slave, and to do your Majesty's will," said Jeffreys. "That being so, I am sure you will pay but scant heed to any clamor that may arise against me."

"I am not given to heed clamor," said the King. "Nevertheless, I must e'en give attention to those rumors concerning the rising in Scotland, and the faction in Holland."

"The nation is with your Majesty," said Jeffreys.

"If it is not it shall be," said the King. "It may be that those who hate my faith will seek to thwart my purposes; but let them beware if they do."

"Who can dare to hate the faith which your Majesty favors?" asked Jeffreys, in a tone of pious wonder.

"Who? Why, some of the bishops?"

"Surely not, your Majesty. But if they do, you shall see that I have not been appointed Lord Chief Justice for naught."

"These bishops have a great hold upon more than half the nation."

"But they are loyal to your Majesty."

The King was silent.

"Your Majesty doth not suspect any of them?"

"I am not sure. As you know, I spoke somewhat hastily when my brother died. I said that I would maintain the established government both in Church and State, and that I would especially maintain the rights and privileges of the Established Church. Much hath been made of this. 'We have now for our Church the word of a king, and of a king who was never worse than l is word.' Now because I have seen fit to have divines of my own faith, and worship according to the ceremonials of the one true religion, I am e'en accused of breaking my promise."

"By whom, your Majesty?"

"It is said that his Grace of Canterbury is not pleased, while Trelawney of Bristol speaketh treason."

"Ah!" cried Jeffreys, with flashing eyes, "say you so, your Majesty? I can well believe it. But to-day I have had a taste of the Trelawney treason."

"What? where?" cried the King.

"Why, at the Guildhall this very day, a young sprig of the Trelawneys told me I was a liar, even while I did but speak to Baxter."

"Tell me more of this," said the King.

Whereupon Jeffreys, in his own fashion, related what had taken place at Baxter's trial, watching as he did so the purple flushes of anger which arose to the King's cheeks.

"But do not trouble, your Majesty," cried Jeffreys. "I will make him smart, and if one of the family do dare to protest, we can e'en make it a handle to use against them."

The King was silent a moment. "This recalls to my mind a request that hath been made to me. On three occasions lately, a man named Trelawney hath sought an audience, but I could not be troubled. This, however, changes my mind," and for a time he relapsed into silence. "I would see this youth," went on the King presently. "You arouse my interest. I would e'en see him."

A New Alphabet

For Christian Boys and Girls

A is Ability, which we all possess;
And, if rightly used, will lead to success:

B is the Battle of Life we must fight,
That we may inherit the Kingdom of Light:

C is for Christian, and Charity, too,
They go hand in hand, if our Conscience rings true:

D is good Deeds, to be done by us all;
And, likewise, for Duty—respond to its call:

E is for Everyone doing his best,
Preparing each day for the great final test:

F is the Future—we all hope it's bright
And so it will be, for those who do right:

G is the Good that each one can do,
By taking the great Golden Rule for his cue:

H is our Hope, for Happiness rare;
'Tis also for Health, to be guarded with care:

I is the Interest we should take in our work,
Doing it cheerfully, not trying to shirk:

J is the Justice, which all shall receive,
On the great Day of Judgment, when none can deceive:

K is the Kindness, that is better than gold;
Of all human virtues, 'tis first in the fold:

L is for Love, whom poets call blind:
It's heaven on earth, for Christian mankind:

M is the Mercy, that true men should show
Toward one another, in this world of woe:

N is our Neighbor, who may be in need—
Hasten to help him, and do a good deed:

O is the Ordeal, that all must pass through,
To gain the reward promised those who are true:

P stands for Paradise, home of the just,
And haven of all who in God's word will trust:

Q is the Quest for all that is best,
'Tis ceaseless and endless, in this world of unrest:

R is for Respect, and also for Reason,
And good Resolutions, just now in season:

S is the Sabbath, all observe it who can,
'Tis the Third Great Commandment given to man:

T is for Temperance, a God-given grace,
'Tis man's guiding star in life's whirlwind race:

U is the Unison, we all should promote,
Making Discord and Anger both strangers remote:

V is for Virtue, its meaning is clear,
'Tis a blessing from God, hold it sacred and dear:

W is the Watch that each one should keep
O'er tongue and o'er mind, to avoid pitfalls deep:

X is the Cross, placed upon us at birth,
And which each must bear until called from this earth:

Y is for Youth, the morning of life,
Be truthful and prudent, avoid sin and strife:

Z is the Zeal, that stamps the true man,
Working out his salvation in accord with God's plan.

Students who Govern Themselves

A stranger visiting the American College for Girls during study hours is surprised at the order and quietness of the place, without apparent effort on the part of the teachers. The students have little need of supervision as, thirteen years ago, with the approval of the Faculty, a Student Government Association was organized, and since that time the students themselves have regulated all the internal affairs of their college life. The help that this institution has been to the College has been practically demonstrated during these years, for not only has it relieved the teachers of a great deal of extra care, and successfully established the necessary order and quietness in the college, but it has also proved a source of education to the students, training them in what their classes alone cannot teach—personal responsibility and self-control. It has promoted the feeling of unity and fellowship among the eleven different nationalities present, and has fostered among them a spirit of loyalty, and a legitimate pride in the success of the college. It has, furthermore, given its members some practical knowledge of the fundamental principles of government, a knowledge essential to the education of every enlightened citizen, whether man or woman.

More than Pleased with it

A few minutes each day will overcome the neglect of years

The pores of the skin are responsible for most complexion troubles. The dust and stain which soap does not remove clog and stifle the pores. Keep them clear and healthy so that the natural oils may do their work of softening the skin.

Pompeian Massage Cream

persuades all foreign matter to leave the pores—softens and expels it so gently so as not to injure their delicate structure, and it leaves behind a healing balm that builds up and nourishes the tissues of the skin.

This is the whole secret of beautifying a poor complexion, or preserving one already perfect. The blood circulates freely as the channels are opened, and nature is again free to tint the cheeks with healthful glow and make the complexion bright and clear.

POMPEIAN MASSAGE CREAM TRADE MARK

This trade mark is on every bottle of genuine Pompeian Massage Cream. Look for it.

Pompeian Massage Cream is so soothing and refreshing that its use is a pleasure rather than a duty. Five minutes' time gives a perfect massage. It contains no grease, or oil, nor anything to encourage the growth of hair. It removes all shine and dead cuticle. It leaves a natural glow that needs no artificial coating of powder or unhealthy cosmetics.

Gentlemen also find it a great luxury, particularly after shaving. It removes the soap rubbed into pores and takes away the smart after a close shave. It is approved by the best barbers (look for the name and trade mark on jar) or may be used at home.

All This We Prove With Our Sample—Sent Free

with one copy of our beautifully illustrated book on Facial Massage—a practical course which enables any gentlewoman to become expert in this most necessary of modern arts to cleanliness—if you will send us the name of your dealer and state whether he sells Pompeian Cream or not.

We prefer you to buy of your dealer whenever possible. Do not accept a substitute for Pompeian under any circumstances. If your dealer does not keep it send us his name, and we will send a 50c. or $1.00 jar of the cream, postpaid, on receipt of price.

Over 100 Confess Christ

A Notable Revival in the Cookman Institute, Florida

THE Cookman Institute of Jacksonville, Fla., is one of the oldest schools in the South distinctively for the education and elevation of the negro youth. It was organized soon after the close of the Civil war, and for nearly forty years has stood as a beacon light for the colored race. Its founder was the Rev. Samuel B. Darnell, and it was named in honor of Alfred Cookman, who, many years ago, went "sweeping through the gates." When the founders of this institution gave to it the name of Cookman Institute, it was a fitting recognition of what this consecrated man of God had done for his unfortunate brother in black.

This pioneer school has always been true to its original design, and has never failed to emphasize the religious phase of its educational work. It is distinctly a Christian school with Christian teachers, forming an ideal Christian home.

In addition to educating the head and training the hand, the importance of religious instruction is not overlooked, as a safeguard, and as the best solution of the vexing negro problem. During the past winter, when about 350 students were in attendance, the president and teachers conducted a series of special religious meetings. As a result of these efforts, over one hundred of the pupils confessed Christ. This, of course, meant a far-reaching victory, as many different homes were touched thereby.

Some four years ago, when the disastrous fire swept over Jacksonville, this school lost all of its buildings. But friends and patrons came to its rescue, and soon two large buildings were erected. These are very plain structures, meagrely furnished and inadequate for the accommodation of the students, numbering about 400 this year. The teachers, five white and four colored, all live with the students in these buildings. The colored teachers have all been trained in the schools of the church in the South, and the white teachers are a band of Christian workers who went to the South to do willing service "In His Name." During the past thirty-five years, about 7,000 have gone out from the Christian influences of this school. Many of them have become leaders among their people, Bishop Grant of the African M. E. Church, being one of that number. It is a remarkable fact that of all the thousands of blacks educated in the mission schools of the South, not one has been found guilty of that heinous crime of which so many negroes have been accused. No prison in the sixteen Southern States has to-day a single occupant holding a diploma from one of these Christian schools. These institutions furnish a solution to the harassing race problem.

In the Cookman Institute, students are given a training that is intended to fit them for gaining an honest livelihood, and for becoming useful and respected citizens. It is an encouraging fact that such a very large percentage of colored parents in the South, who themselves have been debarred from all educational privileges, are eager to secure them for their children.

In its present crowded condition, the progress of the school is greatly handicapped for lack of room. It is now proposed to erect a home for the teachers, to be known as the "Mary B. Cookman Cottage." This building, so much needed, can be built adjoining the other buildings, at a cost of about $2,000. Any aid for the work will be appreciated. J. T. Docking, President of the school, will answer all inquiries.

As Tommy Catlin described it in his fluent tenement English the next day:

"Dere stood dem both in no time, in our door a axin for Miss Catlin. The black-haired one, he passes in de Christmas dinner. I see de old rooster's legs a stickin' out, so did Tabby, you bet smelt 'em. And de tow-headed one, he grabs off his hat and bows perlite, yer know, and says 'and here's a wringin' machine, that's better'n any two arms in de land, and we wishin' yer many happy returns of de day,' and all the time Mike was a callin' from de foot of de stairs. 'Ye royal kids of Her Majesty,' and ye forgot de best of all, and dere was a bag a'bustin' wid candy and popcorn and oranges, and a jolly lot of presents for everybody. And we hugged ourselves all around and wished it was Christmas mornin', and it would last all de year troo."

The King and the Birds

A Swedish Christmas Legend

ONE Christmas morning many years ago, the King of Sweden was returning from church in his sleigh, when he noticed great flocks of small birds circling about in the air above him. The little feathered creatures were uttering shrill cries, and seemed to be flying hither and thither without any fixed purpose.

The King spoke to his coachman about it, and asked him the cause of the commotion among the birds. The coachman, who was of the peasantry, explained to the King that the birds had been driven from the fields and forests by hunger, being unable to secure food, owing to the deep snow, and had found their way into the cities and towns in search of it.

The King listened attentively to the old coachman's recital, and then told him to drive as quickly as possible to the palace. Upon arriving there, the King sent for the chief steward, and directed him to have the largest sheaf of wheat in the royal granary bound to a tall pole, after which the pole was to be erected in front of the palace, that the little birds might suffer the pangs of hunger no longer, and that their Christmas be made a happy one. The King's instructions were carried out, and all day long the birds made merry and enjoyed the King's bounty.

The hundreds of holiday merry-makers passing the palace, stopped to gaze upon the unusual sight. The story of the King's act was passed quickly from one to another, and by nightfall it was known in all parts of the city, and had even found its way into some of the nearby rural districts.

Just think of the far-reaching effect of the lesson in thoughtfulness, taught by this noble King. His action surely "spoke louder than words." To this day, in many sections of the great Scandinavian peninsula, when the wheat harvests are gathered, the farmers always make one particularly large sheaf, which is known as the "Christmas sheaf," and is used to perpetuate the custom inaugurated by the King many years ago. On Christmas morn, as old and young, rich and poor, journey to their respective places of worship, they are greeted everywhere with the huge sheaves of wheat, surrounded by the chirping and twittering little feathered creatures, calling to the minds of the older folks how, in childhood, their parents had told them the story, and they in turn had taken such delight in relating to their own little ones, the origin of the pretty legend of "The King and the Birds."

Answered Prayers

M. B., Cookeville, Tenn. "Please put my name on your list as one who trusts in God and as one who knows he answers prayer, because he has answered my prayers so many, many times, and has so often given me more than I asked for."

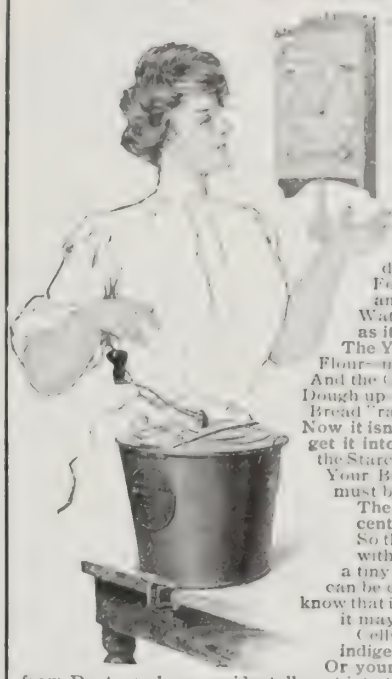
Subscriber, Texas. "I always read the 'Answered Prayers' column first. It is real food to my soul. I want to testify that God does really hear and answer prayer. 'Whatsoever ye desire when ye pray, believe that ye receive and ye shall have.' This promise is to us when we are living as Christ would have us live."

F. M. B. "I was in very great trouble and prayed earnestly. The help came when apparently there was no hope, and from an absolutely unthought of source; so that I had no room to doubt that it was a direct answer to my prayer. Since that I have kept a book of answered prayers, and have had very many answers to record. My faith has been greatly strengthened."

Mrs. H. R., Minnesota. "I know God hears and answers prayers. I promised the Lord if he would save my son from a critical operation, for which he was in an hospital, I would let it be known in this way. In a very short time he was well, without the operation. God has answered my prayers many times. I am now praying for the conversion of my sons, and believe my prayers will be answered. I ask every believer in prayer to join with me."

E. C. M., Knoxville, Tenn. "All my life I have been a firm believer in prayer, and God, for Jesus' sake, has answered many for me. I did not forget him when troubles came. I threw myself on his mercy. I pleaded the worthiness of Jesus and his promises to us. I cried to him again and again. He has answered my prayers. Friends, take everything to Him who said: 'If ye abide in me and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will and it shall be done unto you.'"

How to Make Perfect Bread In Three Minutes.



DO YOU know what makes the soda water in a bottle fizz up when you pull the cork out?

Well—it's a gas escaping that has been put into the bottle under great pressure.

That Gas is produced by several simple chemicals—and it is quite harmless when taken in soda water.

It is a valuable Gas, too—for it is used in making many of our Foods—bread being the principal one.

The most important material we put in Bread is Yeast—because if we didn't put the Yeast in, our Bread would be very hard and tough and indigestible—like "Ship's Biscuit" or "Hard Tack."

For the Yeast when it comes in contact with Flour and Air produces the same Gas they charge Soda Water with—and which is quite as harmless in Bread as it is in Soda Water.

The Yeast also breaks up the indigestible Starch cells in Flour—making your Bread easily digested.

And the Gas which the Yeast, Flour and Air form, blows the Dough up—like you blow up a toy balloon—and makes your Bread "raise"—become light and airy.

Now it isn't as easy to produce the Gas in Bread as it is to get it into a Soda Water bottle—nor is it easy to break up the Starch cells, for Starch constitutes 70 per cent of Flour. Your Bread must "raise" uniformly—therefore the Gas must be mixed all through the Dough.

Then all the Starch Cells must be broken up—70 per cent of Flour is starch.

So that you must have every particle of Flour moistened with a minute drop of Yeast and surrounded with a tiny film of Air before the Gas that "raises" the bread can be created or the Starch Cells can be broken up. You know that if you don't do this mixing and kneading thoroughly it may "raise" one place and not another—or the Starch Cells won't all be broken up—and your Bread will be indigestible.

Or your Bread may sour from Germs, or taste peculiarly from Dust you have accidentally put into the Dough from your hands.

Yet, you can easily moisten each particle of flour with a tiny drop of Yeast and surround the two with a film of Air with the

"Universal" Bread Maker

And you won't get any Germs or Dirt in your Dough, either, to sour or Taste your Bread, for your hands won't touch the Dough at all, except to put it into the Pans when it is made.

All you do to thoroughly and scientifically mix and knead your Bread is to put your liquids containing the Yeast into the Bread Maker, then sift in your Flour and turn the handle 3 minutes—

At the end of that 3 minutes by the clock your Dough will be thoroughly and scientifically mixed and kneaded—each Flour particle will be moistened with a drop of Yeast and the two covered with a film of Air.

For the Kneading Rod of the Universal Bread Maker not only mixes the materials thoroughly, but folds air into the Dough.

It's a wonderful thing, that Kneading Rod—there's no other Kneading Rod can do what it does—we have it patented in every country in the world.

It doesn't do just half the mixing—just moisten half the Flour with the Yeast to leave your Bread half "raised" and half soggy—half digestible and half indigestible—and wholly unsatisfactory, as happens often when you knead Bread by hand.

No Ma am—when you leave your Bread to "raise" over night in the Universal it will surprise you in the morning—it will be "raised" better than you ever had it before.

And when you bake the Dough it will be deliciously toothsome Bread—with a sweet, nutty flavor and odor and entirely digestible.

You wouldn't give up your Universal Bread Maker once you've used it for $50 if you couldn't get another—yet its cost is only $2 at your hardware dealer's.

If you would like to know more about the Universal Bread Maker, send for free Book. A postal will do.

A Handsome Calendar

A Work of Art that Should Find a Place in Every Home

The Pittsburgh Bank for Savings of Pittsburgh, Pa., will mail the readers of the HERALD a copy of their Art Calendar—one of the most beautiful calendar conceptions of 1906.

The subject is the famous painting, "Poppies" by E. Vernon, a student of the celebrated school of Beaux Arts, Paris, France. The painting is faithfully reproduced by the Three Color process, preserving all the rich, yet delicate colorings, tints and flesh tones of the original, and delineates a very attractive type of womanly beauty. As a work of art and a fine example of the Art Preservative it is unsurpassed.

The picture is not defaced by any advertisement. It is mounted on a beveled board 11 x 14 inches and supplied with a silk hanging cord. Send Four cents in stamps to prepay postage.

If interested in money saving and profitable investments request the bank to also mail you a free copy of their illustrated Booklet Z 1.

Reform Movement in China

IN the course of a letter to Mr. J. C. Havemeyer of Yonkers, N. Y., an American missionary in Shantung Province, China, gives the following interesting description of the present situation in that part of the Celestial Empire:

As to the probable effect of the success of the Japanese upon the reform movement in China, one can say without hesitation that it will have the greatest possible effect in this direction. The Japanese are already posing as teachers and guides of the Chinese, and their influence is perceptibly increasing everywhere. You may be aware that the Germans, in 1897, seized a port on the coast of this province, about 175 miles northeast of here, and there built a new town under their exclusive jurisdiction, called Tsingtau. They then extorted an agreement from the Chinese government, giving them certain concessions in the way of mining and railroad developments. They have completed a railway from Tsingtau to Chinanfu, the provincial capital, and have opened several coal mines and other mines. Now the Japanese do not forget that Germany united with Russia to force her to give up Manchuria, when she had won it from China; and, it is plain, that the Germans are now very uneasy, in view of Japan's success. Japan has announced her intention of placing consuls wherever the Germans have them in the interior. German influence will be hereafter greatly checked, to say the least of it.

You have doubtless heard of the extraordinary movement known as the "American Boycott," which is now in progress in Southern and Central China. It grows directly out of the attempt upon the part of our Government to renew the drastic measures of the Exclusion Law. It will unquestionably have its effect in bringing the merchants of the United States, and through them the Government, to a clearer perception of the necessity of changing our method of dealing with China.

It is evident that the Emperor (or rather, the Empress-Dowager, who is the real ruler of the Empire), is beginning to feel the necessity of reform. She has just ordered some of the leading Manchu personages about her to prepare for a tour of inspection among the other nations of the world. The provincial governors have inaugurated reform measures of greater or less importance, but a general, co-ordinated, national movement, such as must take place before anything lasting can be effected, is yet in the future.

The reform, politically, of China is a very different thing from her evangelization. Japan, in spite of her enlightenment, is still a non Christian country. Nor are reform agitations altogether favorable to the advancement of the Kingdom in its more intimate spiritual sense. The Chinese are at best a strongly materialistic people, and these new impulses toward political reform and industrial development are along the same line. One hears very much about the advance of China in resources and power, but very little about her progress toward righteousness and truth, and still less about aspirations after holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord. But all these things are working together, nevertheless, to accomplish God's will for China.

An old Christian was in to see me this morning. He is very poor and ill, having come up twenty-five miles from the country to be treated at our hospital. I was much touched by his words. He cannot read, and, to tell the truth, I have never considered him to be a very good Christian. But in his advancing age and his illness, he seems to be seeing things more clearly. "I tell my neighbors," said he, "that we Christians have to learn three things in our relation to others: We have to learn to suffer loss, and to exercise patience, and to cherish a loving heart." That is not a bad summary of the man-ward side of the Christian life. He said that when he first became a Christian he had more than once to sleep in the open air, because no one would take him in.

The mission work in our province has just suffered a great loss, and I myself have experienced deep personal sorrow, in the tragic death of the Rev. Alfred G. Jones, of the English Baptist Mission of Cbingchowfu. Twenty-eight years ago Mr. Jones left rather extensive business interests in England to become a missionary. He early adopted the principle of adapting himself as nearly as possible to Chinese notions of manner and method of thought. He wore the Chinese costume (as indeed we all did until after the Boxer uprising). His wife and two children had gone home to England and he was living alone. He went down to the famous sacred mountain, known as T'ai Shan, where he took quarters for the summer in a temple, high up on the mountain side. On the night of July 17 there was a terrific storm on the mountain, resembling a cloud-burst. A mountain torrent became blocked by a landslide, and bursting a new channel, overwhelmed the room in which Mr. Jones was sleeping and he was buried under tons of debris. It is thought by those who recovered the body that he was instantly killed.

A Delightful Work of Art

Please accept my hearty thanks for the beautiful "Home-Coming of the Bride" Calendar, received yesterday. It is a delightful study as a work of art, and brings us back in imagination to the days of our ancestors, who made the most of life.

GIFTS TO CHRIST*

GIFTS, precious as those of the wise men, have been poured into Christ's treasury in every age, and we may be quite sure that God has appreciated them. They were signs and tokens of gratitude for the blessings Christianity has brought to the world. Far more might have been given, without expressing the extent of the world's obligations to Him, who gave himself for the redemption of our race. Their chief value in his eyes, however, as we gather from his Word, is that they witness to that supreme gift of the donor's soul to him. They are evidences of consecration not of wealth only, but of spirit. It is so with human fatherhood. The poor little offering that the child makes to his father on a birthday or at Christmas, he could easily buy, but it is precious to him, because his boy denied himself childish luxuries that he might present it to him. Not the intrinsic value of our offerings to God is the measure of their value, but the love and self-denial that they signify.

It was a singularly beautiful incident of our Lord's life that is told in the Gospels of the breaking of the Alabaster box of ointment. That was a purely personal gift. Judas thought it would have been better if the ointment had been sold and the proceeds given to the poor. Our Lord had shown so much sympathy with the poor that many would have expected him to have the same opinion. But not so. That offering pleased him because it was a proof of love. That characteristic note in his reply to his disciple shows how truly human he was. Personal affection for him, faith in him, trust and confidence and fidelity to him personally was never overlooked. His nature has not changed. He values still the gift that costs. He appreciates the sacrifices that his people make to send his words to the uttermost parts of the earth. It may be a small gift that some humble follower makes, but he who can read motives is pleased when he sees that love of him prompted it, and he says: "She hath done what she could."

Mrs. Bird's Christmas Tree

To the Readers of The Christian Herald:

DEAR FRIENDS.—Every year I come before you making an appeal for the Bowery Mission Christmas Tree. I know if you could once catch a glimpse of that wonderful tree, through the sea of happy, eager little faces surrounding it, I should not need to ask for your help; rather you would be asking me for the privilege of being allowed to help.

I want to show you a picture which we saw at Christmas-time—a picture of a bare tenement room on a top floor. The mother is there—a poor, sick woman, destitute, and deserted by her husband. Two small children, too young to go to school, are with her. A boy of four or five is sitting on the floor, with not a thing with which to play. The little baby is fast asleep, hugging in her tiny arms a doll; no, not a doll either, but just a dirty old rag, with a string tied around it near the top, to make a head. Poor, forlorn little ones! With nothing to make their childhood happy and joyous, as childhood always should be; nothing but a rag and a piece of string to satisfy the mother instinct in this sleeping baby. We had gone to this place prepared, and soon the boy was speechlessly happy with a half-worn picture book and a broken horse, while the sleeping baby's arms were made to encircle a real doll, with flaxen hair and blue eyes, dressed all in white. Surely that little one, when she awoke, must have thought an angel had visited her while she dreamed.

Dear CHRISTIAN HERALD friends, wont you be some little one's angel this Christmas, and help us at the Bowery Mission, to bring some sweetness and brightness to the thousands who have even now centered their hopes on the Mission's Christmas tree? SARAH J. BIRD.

All contributions for Mrs. Bird's Bowery Mission Christmas Tree should be forwarded to the care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York. It is hoped that the responses to her touching appeal in behalf of the little ones will be prompt and liberal.

OVERFLOWING LOVE*

VERY simple and easy at the first sight seems John's test of Christianity. It is the test of love. The follower of Christ loves the brethren. John dismisses from all fellowship, and from all right to the name of Christian, any man who cherishes hate in his heart. His creed may be right, he may have no doubts, his conduct may be irreproachable; but if love be absent, he is no true Christian. And Paul, strangely enough, agrees with him. We should not have expected that, because faith was Paul's chief message; but even he says that of faith, hope, and love, love is the greatest. And a greater than either of the apostles said, that on love to God, and love to man, depended all the law and the prophets (Matt. 22: 37-40). The statement, like all our Lord's statements, was profound philosophy.

The Christian, then, is one who loves. He loves God, he loves Jesus, he loves his fellowman. That characteristic includes all the others and it reaches out beyond them. A man might be absolutely clear of transgression, if that were possible, and be able to say: "All these have I kept from my youth up," and yet be a despicable character, cold, heartless, misanthropic. Love touches those dry bones and quickens them to life. Negative goodness rises under its influence to positive benevolence.

But can any one become loving in that sense? Is it possible to love those who are not lovable? That is the power that Christ gives. The loving nature shows that the Master has been at work. We know that such a transformation is possible in a lower degree. A famous novelist describes a physician whose whole strong nature went out in love for a beautiful girl. He doubted if he could win her, but one day he put his fortune to the test, proposed and was accepted. His delight knew no bounds. Patients who needed change of air, he sent away at his own expense. Patients who needed delicacies were told to go to his house and get them. One man, unable to pay his bill, found it receipted. His love and kindness were unlimited. He had been made happy and wanted to make others happy. It is thus that love of Christ transforms the Christian's nature. His capacity of loving is increased, and it does not depend on the character of the object. In an unlovable man he sees a man soured and spoiled by sin and he pities him. He realizes that the man would be a different being if sin had not warped and twisted his nature. He thinks of what the man is capable of becoming under the power that has changed himself, and while he hates the sin, he loves the man. He loves even his enemies, knowing that they are his enemies because they are laboring under a mistake. They would not be his enemies if they knew him better. Like his Master, he prays, "Father, forgive them; they know not what they do."

What a changed world this would be if all Christians allowed this mighty force to animate them! The world could not resist the power of a church overflowing with love. It would be irresistibly drawn to Christ. That is the way to the triumph of the Cross. When every Christian regards every other man as his brother, whose interests he holds dear as those of a brother, and for whom he is prepared to make sacrifices, then the whole world will become a happy family. None will lack the comforts of life, poverty and misery will be abolished, war will cease, competition will end, and there will be no more crime or fraud. That is the long-expected Golden Age, and it will come through the sense of brotherhood founded on love of Christ.

TRUE BLUE CO., DEPT. 399, BOSTON, MASS.

Christ Foreseen

By Mrs. M. Baxter

THE Word of the Lord has shown Christ to be the "Wonderful," as Isaiah said (Isa. 9: 6); his birth wonderful, for it was miraculous; his humiliation wonderful, for it was superhuman; his works miraculous, in healing the sick and casting out devils, in multiplying the loaves, in stilling the storm, in raising the dead, etc., etc. And his words miraculous: "Never man spake like this Man" (John 3: 46). "He spake, and it was done; he commanded, and it stood fast" (Ps. 33: 9), was true of his human life as it was of him in his works of creation. And then, how wonderful in his work of redemption and in his continual intercession for us! In his unspeakable love and grace he is ever more the Wonderful in the eyes of those who are going on to know him.

As the "Counsellor," bringing the counsel of God to man, he comes before us; and as "the mighty God," testified to by the Father (Matt. 3: 17; 17: 5), by devils (Mark 1: 24; 5: 7, etc.); by the Gentile centurion (Matt. 27: 54), by Nathanael (John 1: 49), by the thief on the cross (Luke 23: 42). As "the everlasting Father," given as Man to have life in himself; life which now brings to life those who are dead in trespasses and sins; a life the touch of which woke Jairus's daughter from death, and the word of whom awoke both the son of the widow of Nain and also Lazarus from the dead. And as "the Prince of Peace," between God and man; and between man and man, wherever he has sway, and men are fully subject to his rule. And this is the God-Man! He in whom dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily (Col. 2: 9), and he who in heaven, in our human nature joined to the Divine—still the God-Man—"maketh intercession for us."

In Isaiah 11: 1 he is prophesied of as "a Branch (or sprout), out of the stem of Jesse." Man indeed, but as described in Isa. 9: 6. Yet here we see how the holy Son of God, who "emptied himself" (Phil. 2: 7, R. V.), and took on the likeness of sinful flesh (Rom. 8: 3); not sinful, but like us in our weakness and dependence, needed himself to have the Holy Spirit come upon him for his work. He chose to be, so to speak, on our level, and led, like us, a life of continual dependence upon God. But do not let us forget that before his baptism, when the Spirit came upon him, even "when he cometh into the world, he saith, Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not, but a body hast thou prepared me; in burnt-offerings and sacrifices for sin thou hast had no pleasure. Then said I, Lo I come (in the volume of the book it is written of me) to do thy will, O God" (Heb. 10: 5). And again (John 10: 36), he speaks of himself as him "whom the Father sanctified and sent into the world." There was a precious preparation before he became man.

Again and again he is spoken of as the Branch. In Jer. 23: 5, 6, "Behold, the days came that I will raise unto David a righteous Branch (or sprout), and a King shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely, and this is his name whereby he shall be called, The Lord our Righteousness." Spiritually his true church knows him now as her King, the Lord our Righteousness, and many, many hearts have bowed down before him and yielded to his sway. But in their first and full meaning, these words belong to God's ancient people: the righteous Branch is to be raised unto David, and the fulfilment will be only when Christ indeed shall reign in righteousness in the coming Millennium. Isaiah speaks of him earlier as "the Branch of the Lord . . . beautiful and glorious . . . for them that are escaped of Israel" (Isa. 4: 2).

Fresh Paint Talks

By O. L. Chase.

—And Two Gallons Free to You to Prove All the Claims Made in This Talk.

O. L. Chase

I AM THE PAINT MAN.

I haven't a bit of sense—except paint sense.

Figuratively speaking, I'm wrapped up in Paint—I am smeared all over with it.

My whole time, thoughts and ideas are on the question of paint.

I stand for fresh paint—

And I'll tell you why—

Paint no sooner begins to live than it begins to die—and when you buy paint you buy it for the life in it—for the time it's going to live upon your building.

And to get the most value for your paint money you must buy the life of the paint—not in the can, but the life on your buildings.

—You ask me what is the life of paint?—and I tell you quick—

Pure, cold-pressed, old process Linseed Oil—that's the life of Paint—that's the binder, the soul, the thing that makes Paint stand the racket in storm and sun, and holds the pigments together on your buildings.

—And why does fresh paint made to order have more life than mixed paint?—you ask.

—I'll also give you a quick answer to that

If you could see through the tin of a can of mixed paint you would see a chemical row going on—

The mineral paint pigment—white lead, coloring matter, and dryer—commences to eat the life out of pure linseed oil the minute they get together—

If they have been together in a can on a dealer's shelf, or in a manufacturer's warehouse, for six months, there is just six months' life gone out of the oil—

If they have been together a year, a year's life is killed.

Maybe you never thought of it, but that's the reason why so many jobs of paint crack, curl up, peel off, get chalky, and rub off on your hand.

The oil in that Paint was dead when the Paint was put on—the pigment dried out when exposed to the weather and sun not having the protection of the oil coating.

Now, I'll tell you another thing—

Ready-mixed Paint that you buy in the can is always stale paint—half dead paint—because of the method of its manufacture.

Here's a little paint secret—a manufacturer's secret:

The ready-mixed paint manufacturer has to make his paint up for stock a long time in advance of the sale—he's making it for his warehouse or for the dealer to hold on his shelves, waiting for a customer—

Sometimes the paint waits in these warehouses or on dealers' shelves for six months—a year—two years—longer—so you see when it's opened for use, it's half dead—or three quarters dead, or maybe nearly all dead—

And another thing:

There's a cement-like sediment in the bottom of the can—this can never be properly mixed again.

Now, I am spending money in this advertisement to tell you these things, because my method of manufacturing and selling paint is different.

First—my method of manufacturing;

I manufacture my pure pigment, and pack it in separate cans, from my pure old process linseed oil—which I call "Oilo' to designate it from cheap adulterated oils on the market—

I manufacture this Paint to order after each order is received, and I date each can the day it's packed, with the date placed right on the can by my inspector, so that when my Paint goes to the customer it's absolutely fresh—a certified Paint—that has every bit of life in it.

It's such good Paint that I sell it on six months' time—

No other Paint concern in the world ever sold paint on time until I started.

Maybe their paint wouldn't stand it—I don't know—but anyway, they never sold it that way —And to test my Paint I allow any customer to use two full gallons out of any six-gallon order or over, and then if he is not satisfied that all of my claims are true, and that my Paint is the most elastic, spring-y paint under the brush, looks the best, and is the best, he can send back the balance of the order, and the two gallons will not cost him a penny.

Why You Should Order Now for Spring

There's a limit to my manufacturing capacity—

On account of making paint to order, I am not able to make up a gallon of paint in advance of the big Spring season, which places me in a position every Spring where I have to send back orders, being unable to supply the demand 5,000 gallons is a lot of paint to make in a day.

My orders run larger than that—

I'm telling you this because I have an advance-order plan which will enable you to get paint in the Spring months just the week you want to use it.

I number these advance orders, place them on file in my office, with space and material reserved in my factory to make up these orders during the week they are wanted, and these come ahead of all orders taken later in the painting season.

So if you want to insure yourself getting my made-to-order fresh paint at a certain time next Spring, write for my Advance-Order Blank, and my beautiful Paint Book just off the press, which tells all about fresh and made-to-order Paint and gives you a large collection of good sized color-cards to select from—select the paint you want—send me an advance order, subject to cancellation within thirty days from the time the paint is to be delivered, and subject to a change in color if you desire.

I will acknowledge this order, and register it up, and guarantee to furnish you the Paint on my "Two gallons—free trial—six months to pay" plan—

The date of payment will be six months from the time the order is filled—

This will insure you getting fresh paint just when you want it, on 6 months' time.

And let me tell you—over half the capacity of my factory is already sold out for next spring, so you should write me at once, if you want to take advantage of this advance-order offer.

Eight Years Guarantee

I give an officially signed, iron-clad Guarantee for eight years on my made-to-order fresh Paint.

This is the longest and most liberal Guarantee ever given by a Paint Manufacturer—and back of this guarantee stands my $50,000 Bond.

All in all, my paint proposition is the greatest one ever put on the market, and you should get my literature at once.

For a postal card with your name and address I will send you my beautiful Paint Book—my little Instruction Book, entitled "This Little Book Tells How to Paint," copy of my Eight-Year Guarantee, and my Advance-Order Blanks.

Write at once.

SPINAL CURVATURE AND KINDRED AILMENTS.

Mr. P. B. Sheldon, the inventor of the appliances made by us, suffered from Spinal Curvature for years. In time he tried nearly every known form of support with little relief or benefit. He finally invented a spinal appliance which enabled him to assume and maintain a natural upright position. This Appliance is an important part of the Sheldon Method of overcoming Spinal Curvature. It gives an even, continuous, perfect support to a weak or deformed spine; average weight only 16 ounces; is cool, comfortable, durable, pliable, and capable of easy and accurate adjustment. Put on and taken off easily as a coat; causes no inconvenience in working or exercising, and is not noticeable under clothing. It is designed for men, women, and children. It is the only safe and humane appliance to place on a young child because its elasticity and ease of adjustment permit full growth and development.

With it is furnished a marvelous absorbent application which takes all pain and soreness out of the back, makes the stiffened muscles relax, and assists in the strengthening of the spine. A [illegible] a system of special physical exercises also accompanies the appliance.

By this remarkably successful method you can be treated in your own home. The price of the combined treatment places relief in your easy reach. Each Appliance is made to individual measurements and fits perfectly. We have strong testimonials from every State in the Union, and the endorsements of noted physicians. We guarantee satisfaction or refund your money at the end of thirty days' trial. No matter how long you have suffered, there is still bright hope for you.

Write and tell us about your own or any case in which you are interested. We will send you our catalogue, which fully explains, by word and picture, how Spinal Curvature, weak backs, stooped shoulders and weak abdomens are corrected and permanently overcome by the Sheldon Method.

OUR MAIL BAG

Questions and Answers

Letters for this department must contain name and address of the sender—not for publication, but in order that an answer may be sent by mail in cases where the inquiry is not of general interest.

E. A. C., Minersville, Pa. 1. What percentage of the immigrants who come to this country return to their native land? 2. If Christ had not risen from the dead, would there be a general resurrection?

1. Any answer would be guesswork, as the United States Government keeps no record of returning foreigners as such. Probably the proportion is not large. Quite a number of the natives of the south of Europe, however, Italians etc., come over here and work for the summer, returning in the fall. 2. See I. Cor. 15: 12-18.

C. E. B., Bradford, Pa. What was the attendance at the World's Fair, at St. Louis, from April 30 to Dec. 1, 1904?

The Fair lasted 187 days. During that time 18,741,073 people entered the grounds. There were 187,793 on the opening day, and 203,101 on the closing day.

T. B., Clay Center, Kan. I see in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of the 22d, that you say in substance that the Russian fleet came to our coast during the Civil War for the sole purpose of showing her friendship to this country in her hour of need. I have always thought the real reason for her coming at that time, was because the relations between Russia and France were very unfriendly, and that Russia was expecting France might declare war against her at any moment. And at that time France had a small fleet of war vessels off the coast of Mexico, and in the event of France declaring war, she could swoop down on her and capture or destroy her small fleet. So Russia was really using as a cover for her real intention, her pretended friendship. I have read in a recently published life of the late Senator from Massachusetts, Hon. Charles Sumner, the view I have here indicated. I would like to know through THE MAIL BAG if there is not a large grain of truth in this view.

The explanation given above is a new one. Of course, it may be the true one; but it is, nevertheless, a fact that Russia's friendship for the United States at that time, as accounting for the unexpected presence of her fleet, has been very widely accepted as the actual reason.

M. R. W. Please inform a country subscriber the origin and meaning of "graft," as applied to speculative corporations?

It is a word of very recent coinage and means money obtained corruptly, either as plunder, bribe, illegal or immoral commission, or a share in any spoil or booty taken out of funds belonging to the public, to stockholders or private individuals. In a general sense, it means illegal money-making.

N. A. R., Columbus, O. How old was the Apostle Paul when he organized the church at Corinth? Was that his first church?

The dates of the Acts are somewhat confused, but the general opinion is that it was in the year A. D. 50 that Paul began his work in Corinth. He would then be about forty-eight years of age. As you will see by the Acts, Paul labored in many cities before going to Corinth, and doubtless founded churches (see Acts 15: 36, and 16: 6, 7). Philippi and Thessalonica both preceded Corinth.

E. P. Browning, Ill. Is the word "repentance," in such passages as Gen. 6: 6, Jonah 3: 10, used in its present tense? Did God really repent?

The expression merely indicates a change in God's method of procedure. You cannot imagine his regretting anything that he has done. Throughout the Bible the writers describe God's character under the figure of human thoughts and feelings. We could not understand it in any other way. God foresees all that will occur, but the writers represent him as being affected by human conduct, as in the instance of Nineveh, to which you refer. He sends his messenger to warn and threaten, but the people humble themselves, and the threatened judgment is averted. It is not that God changes or repents, but that the people change. In the earlier passage, it is an expression of regret that men had failed to fulfil the purpose for which God had brought them into existence.

As several readers have written to inquire concerning the statements published, that Mrs. Anthony (the aged mother of "Bill" Anthony, the naval hero), was again in want, we take pleasure in giving space to the following letter from Mrs. Anthony herself, which sufficiently disposes of the rumors in question:

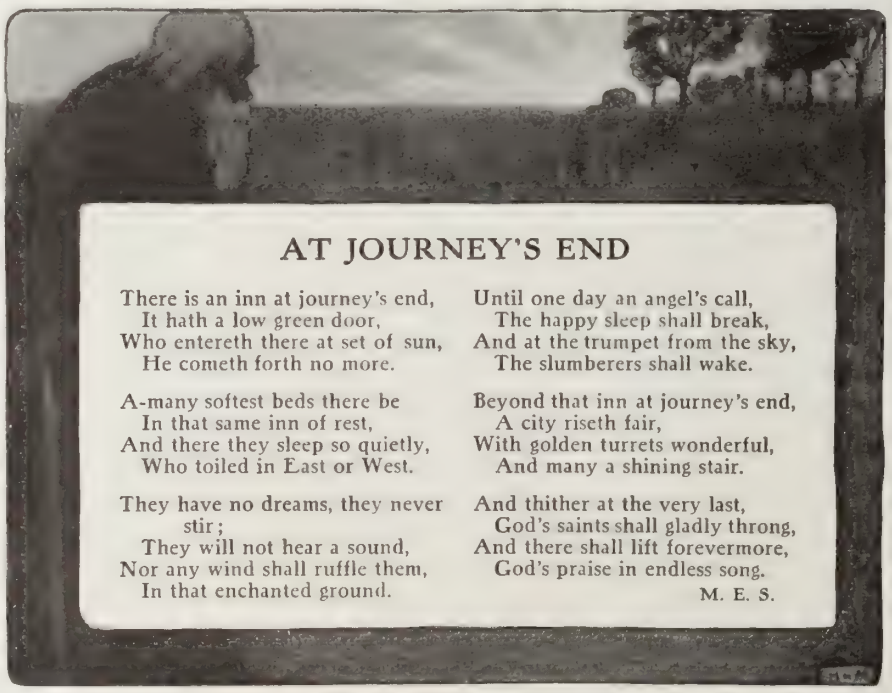
DEAR MR. EDITOR:—I wish to state that the reports which were recently published of my extreme destitution are not true, neither is the statement that I do errands for the neighbors to support my crippled son. He is crippled, but is able to earn his own living; but cannot support me.

My wants are supplied by the kindness of friends, readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who have taken care of me since last May, and who will care for me as long as it is necessary.

MARY ANTHONY.

R. C., Mineral Wells, Tex. Does life, in any form, exist on any of the other planets besides the earth?

This has been a fruitful question in all ages. As far as man knows, to a certainty, the earth is the only inhabited world in the universe. The Bible, however, says (Isaiah 45: 18), that the earth would have been created in vain if not inhabited. We



AT JOURNEY'S END

There is an inn at journey's end,
It hath a low green door,
Who entereth there at set of sun,
He cometh forth no more.

A-many softest beds there be
In that same inn of rest,
And there they sleep so quietly,
Who toiled in East or West.

They have no dreams, they never stir;
They will not hear a sound,
Nor any wind shall ruffle them,
In that enchanted ground.

Until one day an angel's call,
The happy sleep shall break,
And at the trumpet from the sky,
The slumberers shall wake.

Beyond that inn at journey's end,
A city riseth fair,
With golden turrets wonderful,
And many a shining stair.

And thither at the very last,
God's saints shall gladly throng,
And there shall lift forevermore, bodied men. They are great fighters, and have always been at war with the Spaniards and Mexicans, and though often defeated, the Yaquis have never been conquered. The last struggle was in 1899. The Indians were well armed and fought desperately, but gained no permanent victory. They are an industrious people, and worked very faithfully during the building of the Southern Pacific Railway. The money they saved they invested in rifles and ammunition. Those who know the Yaquis best say that they are much superior in intelligence to other Indians.
God's praise in endless song.

C. C. E., Union Level, Va. 1. What does the baptism for the dead in I. Cor. 15: 29 mean? 2. If men are restored to their original state through the atonement of Christ, why do they still die? 3. If we believe that God was the Creator of all things, must we regard him as the Creator of sin?

1. Some custom in vogue in the Corinthian church, probably an attempt to gain for some of the dead the benefits supposed to come from baptism. The Apostle does not endorse the practice, but mentions it as an evidence that those who practice it thereby show their belief in a future life. 2. Men are not restored to their original state by the atonement. You may pardon can, therefore, assert, with powerful reasons, bordering on positiveness, that all the other seven planets have been, now are, or hereafter, will be inhabited by intelligent beings. The solar system consists of four small planets and four of mammoth proportions. Jupiter alone (now brightly shining in the evening eastern sky), is 1,400 times as large as the earth; in fact, much larger than all the others, with their twenty-five moons, combined. Did God make them all in vain, that silence and death might reign triumphant forever? LEWIS SWIFT.

Marathon, N. Y.

M. C., Newark, N. J. Who are the dogs and swine to whom Christ referred in Matt. 7: 6?

People who, having heard the Gospel, turn it to ridicule and reject it. Religion is not to be forced on any one. Paul acted on this command when he turned from the Jews (Acts 13: 46) and preached to the Gentiles. Solomon gives similar advice (Prov. 9: 7).

Sadie B., Ogeechee Shoals, Ga. Can you tell me something about the Yaquis Indians? Is it true that they are more intelligent than, and superior to, other tribes of Indians?

The Yaquis live in the southern part of the State of Sonora, Mexico. They are reduced from a large tribe, which formerly numbered 300,000, to about 15,000, and not more than a third of these are able-the guilty, but you cannot make them innocent. 3. God did not create sin. Sin came through man perverting God's good gifts. All sin is a perversion of good.

A. H. P., Coxsackie, N. Y. Who was the father of Prince Louis, of Battenberg?

Prince Louis is the eldest son of Prince Alexander, of Hesse, Germany, and grandson of Louis II., Grand Duke of Hesse. The Prince was born in Gratz, Austria, but became a British subject after his marriage to Princess Victoria, granddaughter of Queen Victoria.

Reader, Hegins, Pa. Must we regard the jumping and shouting which characterizes some revivals as being the work of the Holy Spirit?

We must be careful of judging in such matters. It is difficult to believe that such manifestions are in any sense spiritual. Men of education and culture would not be affected in that way; but the ignorant and impulsive, when filled with joy, might know no other way of giving adequate expression to their feelings. Their conduct shocks quieter people, but we ought to be glad that they are saved in any way.

U. W., Wilmington, Del. Who was Thomas the Rhymer?

He was Thomas of Ercildoune, also called Learmont, a Scotch poet and seer, who lived between 1220 and 1297. He wrote among other poems, one entitled, "Sir Tristrem." The ruins of his ancient tower are still standing near the Scotch border.

P. H., Lake City, Iowa. Why was the Apocrypha left out of the Bible? What the date of its being left out, and the number of books and their names?

The Apocrypha (books of doubtful authenticity or anonymous authorship), were excluded in the early days of the Christian church by various councils. We would advise you to read in your encyclopedia concerning the acts of the Council of Trent, and the definite fixing of the Canon of Scripture, when the spurious and doubtful books were formally excluded. The list is too long to be reprinted here.

J. S., Rockville, Pa. 1. What is the population of Palestine? 2. How near the ruins of Nineveh is the country inhabited? 3. What is the population of Babylon, and is there any prospect of the city being rebuilt?

1. There are no accurate statistics to be obtained, but reckoning five persons to a house, there would be about 650,000. This is not counting the Jewish colonies recently established. Probably at no time has it been more than four times that number. 2. There are only a few villages, composed of hovels, in the vicinity of Nineveh. 3. The site of Babylon is but a few mounds of earth, and the prophecy of Isaiah that "it shall never be inhabited," is well fulfilled. See Prof. Banks' article in this issue.

L. M., Norwalk. What was the name of Perry's flagship at the battle of Lake Erie in 1813?

In the early part of the fight Perry was on board the Lawrence, but the vessel becoming disabled, he transferred his colors to the Niagara.

M. S. B. M., Kingston, N. Y. Who were the Nicolaitans (Rev. 2: 15)?

Nicolas, a deacon of the Church of Jerusalem, founded the sect known as Nicolaitans. He divorced his wife "for the sake of sanctity," and afterward took her back. The sect at one time was so sunk in debasement that it threatened to destroy the purity of the entire Christian Church. (See II. Pet. 2:12, 13, 18; Jude 7: 8.) There are various versions of their origin.

P. G., Granville, N. Y. How much of South Florida is covered by the Everglades?

The everglades are 160 miles long and 60 broad.

Miscellaneous

Miss H. J. B., New Haven, Conn. Indian Summer usually comes in November.

Mrs. W. H., Leslie, Mich. The Reorganized Church and the Mormons are different organizations.

N. W., Aultsville, Ont. Can. We see nothing wrong in holding such an entertainment on a week-day.

T. V. F., Brattleboro, Vt. No; we do not consider either of the incidents you mention consistent with Christian profession.

H. J., New York. As a matter of fact, whatever a "professing" Christian might do, no "real" Christian will give up his time to dancing, card-playing, and theatre-going.

C. M. M., North Granby, Conn. The tobacco habit is unquestionably a vice, though many regard it as a comparatively mild one. Physicians agree that it is injurious to the human system.

S. McC., Newark, O. We understand that the reported shipment of women to Panama is now under investigation. The officials have explained that these women were the wives of the workmen.

A. R. Attleboro, Mass. It is perfectly proper, while saying grace at meals, to ask not only blessing but pardon. We can see nothing wrong in your statement of what you did. Possibly some one may have felt the appeal to be too personal.

Mrs. W. L. T., East Palmyra, N. Y. It has been repeatedly asserted by writers and travelers, that King Menelik, of Abyssinia, traces his descent to the Queen of Sheba. Beyond this mere assertion, no proof of the fact has been published, so far as we know; but it is not impossible that the claim may be well founded.

Babylonian Excavations Confirm the Bible

By DR. EDGAR JAMES BANKS, University of Chicago

Site of Ur of the Chaldees, the home of Abraham

Tablet showing Jehu (x) kneeling and paying tribute

Sennacherib on the mountain side at Lachish

IF I were to preach a sermon on Babylon, my text would be the closing words of the thirteenth chapter of Isaiah: "Babylon, the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah. It shall never be inhabited, neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation; neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there; . . . but wild beasts of the desert will lie there; and their houses shall be full of doleful creatures; and owls shall dwell there, and satyrs shall dance there. And the wild beasts of the islands shall cry in their desolate houses, and dragons in their pleasant palaces." So sang Isaiah two and a half millenniums ago, and such is a picture of Babylon to-day. The homes of world-renowned emperors have turned to ruined mounds; the hanging gardens and lofty temples are now heaps of clay; the streets once filled with chariots and men, which once resounded with the tread of powerful armies, are now deserted; only the childlike cry of the jackal, or the hoot of a solitary owl hiding in some once pleasant palace, breaks the perpetual stillness. Here and there a few shapeless mounds so barren that the shepherds pass them by; so desolate that the Arab fears to pitch his tent there—this, as Isaiah prophesied, has for more than two thousand years, been a picture of Babylon.

In 1842, the French Government stationed a consul at Mosul, on the Tigris River, with instructions to excavate the neighboring ruins of Nineveh. An Arab, who saw the Frenchman exploring the ruins, asked him the object of his search. When the consul replied that he was seeking for stones with pictures and writing upon them, the Arab asked him to come to a mound a few miles away, where such stones were found whenever the foundation of a new house was laid. They came to a little village perched upon a high mound; in the walls of the mud houses were built fragments of bas-reliefs of marble, and all were covered with inscriptions in the ancient Assyrian language. The Frenchman opened excavations in the mounds, and at the very beginning of his work he found himself in a room of the palace of Sargon, the king of Assyria, who, in 722 B.C., captured Samaria, the capital of North Israel, and carried away ten of the twelve Hebrew tribes into captivity. The walls of the room were covered with beautifully engraved stones and inscriptions. When the writing upon the wall was read, it was found to contain the Assyrian account of the capture of Samaria, and of the captivity of the Israelites. The Hebrew account of this event is mentioned in a single verse in the seventeenth chapter of II Kings, which says: "In the ninth year of Hosea, the king of Assyria took Samaria and carried Israel away unto Assyria." This is all it says; not even the name of the Assyrian king is mentioned. The Assyrian account of the same event, as recorded upon the walls of the ancient palace, says: "I besieged and occupied the city of Samaria, and took 27,280 of its inhabitants captive. I received from them fifty chariots, but left them the rest of their belongings. I placed my lieutenants over them."

Corner of the Temple where the Belshazzar Tablet was found

You may ask if 27,280 is the correct number of the Israelitish captives. The Assyrian kings have left pictures of long lines of prisoners filing before a tally-keeper, who counted them as they passed. Here, then, we not only have a confirmation of one of the most important events of Hebrew history, but also additional light upon it.

The world is frequently startled by the theories of the critics, who would destroy the belief which we have treasured from of old. Half a century ago the German critics were asserting that such a person as Belshazzar, of the book of Daniel, the king who saw the writing of the hand upon the wall, never existed but in legend. At that very moment an Englishman, Mr. Taylor, who was excavating in the ruin of Mugheir, in Southern Babylonia, found in the corner of an old tower a small, perfect, baked-clay cylinder completely covered with ancient Assyrian writing. The cylinder proved to contain an inscription from Nabonidus, king of Babylon, ending with a prayer in these words:

"May reverence for thy great divinity dwell in the heart of Belshazzar, my first born, favorite son. May he commit no sin; with the fullness of life may he be satisfied."

Since then several inscriptions from the hand of Belshazzar have come to light. The ruin in which this precious inscription was found contained bricks bearing the name of Ur. It was the long lost city, Ur of the Chaldees, the home of Abraham.

A generation ago, when men began to study the Bible critically, one of the greatest religious controversies was: Could Moses write? It was even questioned whether the art of writing was known in Palestine as early as his day. Some said that Moses could write, for he wrote the first five books of the Bible. Others said that he did not, and that writing was not known.

In the midst of the controversy, as an old Egyptian woman was poking among the ruins of Tell-el-Amarna on the Nile, in upper Egypt, she upturned a clay tablet covered with early Assyrian writing. Later, in the ruin, 320 large, beautiful tablets or letters were found. Some of the letters were written in Jerusalem, Tyre, Sidon and other cities of Palestine, fifteen centuries before the Christian era, or long before the time of Moses. One of them speaks of bitter conflicts between the invaders and the natives of the land, forcibly reminding us of the long, bitter conflicts between the early Hebrews and the Canaanites. The controversy as to whether or not the art of writing was known in Palestine in the time of Moses ceased at once.

The Assyrian inscriptions not only explain and throw light upon the Bible, but frequently give us knowledge of Hebrew history not mentioned in the sacred writings. In a palace which was excavated at Nimrud, one of the early Assyrian capitals, was found a large, black, stone monument covered with inscriptions, and with pictures illustrating the life of the Assyrian king. In one of the pictures is a figure kneeling, and bowing his head as if in the act of kissing the feet of the Assyrian king before him. Above the picture the cuneiform

CHRISTMAS JOSEPH

Sermon by Rev. Frank DeWitt Talmage, D.D.

TEXT:—Matthew 1: 16, "Joseph the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus"

AMAZING it is to read the reviews of the latest books of our prominent novelists. It seems as though we are perusing the columns of a homiletic review, or are reading the resume of the sermons of ministers written in a religious weekly, instead of a summary of the imaginative works of our secular writers. The novelist's fad of finding his heroes and heroines among the castled walls of chivalric times has to a great extent passed away. Our modern Bulwers are not searching among the smoke and the tottering walls of a licentious Pompeii to seek out their blinded Lydias. Our Charles Kingsleys are not roaming about the edge of a Sahara to find the footprints of a beautiful heathen celibate, Hypatia by name. Our brilliant Sir Walter Scotts are not turning the ruins of a Kenilworth Castle into a gorgeous banquet hall, where the rival earls of a mighty kingdom are rising side by side to drink the health of a Virgin Queen. But a large percentage of our modern novelists are finding the scenic settings for their most powerful chapters among the Judæan hills, or by the placid waters of Lake Galilee, or down among the vine-clad valleys of a Samaritan capital.

But though many of the great characters of the Old and New Testaments have been made to come forth out of their graves and live and breathe as in times of yore, there is one Bible character who has never, so far as I know, been made the hero of a historical novelist's tale. Indeed, there is one Bible character that has never, so far as I know, been made the subject of a sermon. The ministers seem to ignore making a sketch of this man, just as do the historical novelists. I allude here to the character of Joseph. I do not mean Joseph, who was the son of old Jacob, or Joseph of Arimathæa, but of Joseph of Nazareth, Joseph of Bethlehem, Joseph the carpenter, Joseph who was the husband of Mary, of whom Jesus was born. Now, as the annual Christmas holidays are but a few days off, I thought I would preach a sermon about Joseph the carpenter. I want to tell you why he was at the manger. In other sermons you have heard why Mary was there, and why the shepherds were there, and why the wise men were there, and why the sheep and the cattle and the horses were there. To-day I want to tell you why Joseph was there. And of all the characters of the Bible, there is not one which appeals to me in a more vivid way than does this brawny, rugged, stout-limbed mechanic, who passed so much of his time among the Zebulon hills.

Joseph came to the manger, in the first place, to make it possible for Jesus to be born in Bethlehem of Judæa. He came to the manger in order that the words of the prophet might be fulfilled. He came to the manger because towards Judæa all the sages of the Jerusalem capital were looking for the expected Son of God to be born. He came to the manger, for if he had not come, Mary the Virgin would never have gone there to give birth to her child, and the wise men of the East would never have been able to find there the infant Christ. This being born in Bethlehem was absolutely essential for the fulfilment of prophecy.

There were two ways by which the stamp of divinity was to be placed upon Christ's life. The first was by his miracles. What do I mean by that? Simply this. When the people began to crowd around Jesus and he said, "I am the Son of God; follow me," the people answered, "How do we know thou art the Christ?" He said, "I will show you. Come and see." Then he stooped down and made the crooked limbs straight. Then he expectorated upon the ground and made a salve out of the spittle and dirt, and rubbed it upon the blinded eyes and they were opened. Then he stopped by the bier of the only son of his mother and she a widow, and he said, "Young man, I say unto thee, arise!" Then he turned to the people and practically said, "Could any being, unless he was the Son of God, do these miracles? I demand from you obedience to my will, on account of the wonders that I perform." Then when the people again said, "By what right dost thou claim to be the promised Messiah?" he could answer, "Because I fulfil in my person the predictions of your own prophets, and at the very beginning was that utterance of Micah the prophet who wrote over seven centuries ago: 'But thou, Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall he come forth unto me that is to be a ruler in Israel; whose goings forth have been of old, from everlasting.' Did not the prophet foresee my birth? Was I not miraculously born, according to the prediction?" Jesus would not have been able to give this convincing answer, if Joseph had not been the man he was. How did it happen that Joseph and Mary were, at this critical time, in that particular place, so far from their home?

Jesus in the Carpenter Shop at Nazareth

By a decree of Rome, in reference to the levying of taxes, Cæsar Augustus wanted to know how much money he could collect from his provinces; therefore he ordered a census to be taken. All the people of Palestine had to answer to that enrollment. But, though Judæa was a conquered province, the Roman law allowed itself to be harmonized with the Hebrew law. In other words, it allowed the Hebrew people to be enrolled by families, as they had always been accustomed to do, instead of by districts. Thus all the descendants of David assembled at the proper time in the Bethlehem village, where their great ancestor was born. And that was the reason Joseph, the native of Nazareth, traveled all the way from the north to be enrolled in Bethlehem at that particular time when Jesus was born. And because Joseph had no one with whom to leave his wife, that is the reason he took her along. Thus we find that this important fact, fulfilling the ancient prophecy, which would be so vital to a Jew, was brought about by the tenderness of Joseph, the husband of Mary. On such small matters do great events hang. Is it not an impressive thought that God plans all the events of our lives, as we see in the arrangement of the circumstances that brought Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem at this time?

The protection and development of Christ during the days of his helpless infancy, were provided for by Joseph's love and care. Christ had to have care during his infancy, just as any other new-born babe needs care. Christ's childhood days were passed in much the same way that other children live out their earlier years. The baby Christ had to be washed and dressed and fed. He had to be taught to creep and run and play. He had to be developed physically and mentally, like any other baby boy. Now, as Christ's boyhood days were to be so helpless, it was necessary "for God to provide a protector for the helpless Mary and her infant child." Thus God chooses this humble carpenter, and says, "Joseph, go and look after my son. You are to stand in my place and be to him an earthly father." And Joseph, in obedience to this command, went and stood between Jesus and physical and mental want. That is another reason why we find Joseph at the manger.

Do you not glory in the fact that as Joseph, the humble carpenter, paved the way for Christ's advent, Joseph the humble carpenter was the means of Christ's sustenance during the years of his childhood. The work of Joseph the carpenter, caring for the helpless Christ during his years of infancy, should teach us all to honor God in our own work in life, no matter how insignificant it may be.

Cans't thou not seize the inspiration of this lesson for the coming Christmas Day? One of the most beautiful pictures ever painted is that called, "The Carpenter Shop of Nazareth." There the great Master opens the humble door for all the world to look in and see a beautiful family scene. On one side of the rooms it's a woman sewing. Her eyes are cast down; but her face is a beautiful face—so pure, so gentle, so truthful. Her fingers are busy. The financial struggle of that home is a heavy one to bear. "She layeth her hands to the spindle, and her hands hold the distaff." She is Mary, the mother of Jesus. At her feet is a little flaxen-haired child playing. The face is that of a child; but as you gaze on those eyes and that wondrous face, you feel that you are watching a perfect child, ay, a supernatural one. The little child, of course, is Jesus. The floor is covered with shavings. The carpenter's implements are scattered around. A strong, powerful-limbed workman is bending over a workman's table, joining together two pieces of wood. This Hebrew face is that of Joseph the carpenter—Joseph, who is earning bread for the infant Christ. "Ah," I said to myself as I watched that picture, "would that I might be able to have some soul leaning on me, as the infant Christ was ependent upon Joseph. Would that I might lead some ne to Christ, and then carefully protect him and help im during his years of temptation, even as Joseph pro-ected Jesus during his years of childhood helplessness." o you wonder that Joseph had a right to be standing ear to the manger on the first Christmas morn?

The ennobling example of a pure marital love was rnished by Joseph's journey to the Bethlehem manger. he gentle love which bound your father and mother ogether, and moulded you, and your brothers, and sters in a moral and spiritual way, was the same kind f gentle love that bound Joseph to Mary, and helped o mould the mental life of the infant Christ. For nough Joseph the carpenter was not the father of esus, he gave him parental care, and must have re-eived from that loving nature a boy's gratitude. Still ore as Jesus grew to years of discretion, and learned ne circumstances of his birth, would his love for his other include also the man who had protected her. othing more manly is found in all history than Jo-eph's attitude toward Mary when he found out she as to become the mother of the infant Christ.

Joseph's Ordeal

Let me explain to you this history more in detail. oseph was an intense man. He was one of those men hom women have hard work to influence. He was vidently an elderly man, probably fifty years of age; ut he was one who, when he did surrender his heart o a woman, gave to her his whole heart, and not a art. He loved Mary with that deep, tender, holy af-ection which only a true, strong man can give to a uly good, noble, beautiful woman. He loved her with love that would willingly lay down his life, if he could ake the loved one happier by the sacrifice. He loved er so much that her companionship became the hope, he joy, and the heart of his very existence. He loved er for time and for eternity.

Now, when Mary was about to become the mother of hrist, all the people of her village knew it. They ossiped about it. They at once looked upon her as a ad woman. In the sight of those Hebrew people she as a social outcast. Joseph was at first much trou-led. The Bible tells us that he was about to break he bonds of the marital engagement, and "put her way privily;" but when an angel of the Lord appeared nto him, and said that Mary was to become the moth-r of the Son of God, "for that which is conceived in er is of the Holy Spirit," at once this brave, noble arpenter became her protector. He knew that he ould be despised for marrying her, yet he hesitated ot one instant. He stepped right up to her side. He ut his arm about her. He said: "Marry me, Mary, nd slander shall not touch thee. I shall give thee the protection of my name." Then he turned, and faced the cynical, sneering, scoffing, deriding world as with flashing eye he said: "This is my wife. He who strikes at her strikes at me!" Did you ever read of a more noble and manly act than this of Joseph, who gave to this trembling girl the protection of his name at the most sacred moment of her life.

I am glad that the man who stood to Jesus in the relation of a father should have been so noble a character, and that his boyhood was spent in a home so hallowed by marital affection. If it was important for Jesus, the Son of God, to have the example of a loving father and mother continually before him during the years of his childhood, is it not also vitally important for your children to have the example of a loving father and mother before them? The divine love is first revealed to a child through the Bible? Oh, no. Through what the minister preaches in the pulpit or the Sunday School teacher tells him in the Sunday School? Oh, no. It is first revealed by the gentleness and kindness with which the father of that child deals with the mother, and the mother with the father. Beware, oh parents, how you lose your tempers before your children. Beware how you let selfishness creep into your hearts. Beware how you become jealous or faultfinding.

The Saviour's struggle for daily bread, when he became a young man, was also the result of Joseph's journey to the manger of Bethlehem of Judæa. When Joseph went to Bethlehem with Mary, he seemed to say, "I will look after thee and the young child." But there came a time when Joseph could no longer look after Mary and Jesus. Death came in and took Joseph away. Then Jesus had to step into Joseph's place, and become the support of the rest of the family.

Caring for the Fatherless

Now of what did this family consist? Every Bible commentator who ever penned a description of Joseph, makes him out to be a middle-aged or an elderly man at the time of his marriage to Mary. Some assert that not only was Joseph a middle-aged man when he married Mary, but that he had other children. Personally, I do not believe there is any objection to these two assertions. Scripture itself seems to harmonize with these two suppositions. In the first place, we find that the Bible never speaks about Joseph after the scene in the temple, when Christ as a boy is talking with the doctors. Joseph was not with Mary at the wedding of Cana of Galilee. He was not with Jesus during any of his tours. He was not with Christ at the time of the crucifixion. Therefore, the Bible reader has a right to suppose that a short time after Jesus came to young manhood, Joseph, the carpenter, died. Then Christ has to go to work and take his foster-father's place in the workshop. He had to do as your elder brother did on the farm when your father died. When Christ was little more than a boy, he had to do a man's work, ay, and more than a man's work. Jesus had to support his mother's family.

Christ, by the forced toil and struggle, must have been fitted for sympathy with the struggles of young men and young women. There must have been many a weary hour in that carpenter shop, when Jesus, with aching back, struggled on to fight the wolf of cold and of hunger from the door. Christ, as the man, sympathizes with the hungry, because Christ as the boy, perhaps often went faint to bed, that his brothers and sisters might have enough to eat. The ties which bound Mary the mother to her eldest son, were very sacred. Side by side they must have struggled to rear those children. Side by side they must have stood by the husband's grave. Side by side they must have drunk deep out of the chalice filled with their bitter tears. Christ was nurtured and cared for during his years of infancy, because Joseph, the carpenter, stood by his manger. Christ was better fitted for his life-work of sympathy, because the children of that same Joseph were thrown upon Jesus' young shoulders to support.

Joseph's Service

Thus the influence of a good man lives on after he has passed away. The noble life of some dear one, may have stimulated you to deeds of nobleness, while he was yet with you; let its power abide with you, now that he is gone, making you useful to those around you, and to the Master also. Remember, that Joseph, the carpenter, dead, was as much essential to Christ's filial service, as Joseph, the carpenter, was when alive.

And so, my brother, when you look at the different pictures commemorative of the Nativity, I do not want you to spend all your time watching Mary, or the infant Christ, or the shepherds, or the cattle, or the sheep, or the horses, or the wise men. I want you, at least for a little while, to watch the swarthy features of the noble mechanic who stood by the manger as the husband of Mary. He was Christ's defender from slander pre-natal. He was Christ's caretaker in Bethlehem. He was part of Christ's existence in the Egyptian exile. He was Christ's protector in Nazareth. And as you watch the face of this noble carpenter, may you be able to say, "Oh, God, if it is not thy will to make me a Moses or a Joshua, or a Caleb, or a David, or a Paul, or a John, let me be a true and a faithful Joseph of Bethlehem, Joseph of Nazareth, and Joseph the husband of Mary, of whom Jesus was born." Such, at least, is my desire when I look upon the rough face and the callous hands of Joseph, the carpenter.

vords explaining it, say: "The tribute of Jehu, the on of Omri,—silver, gold, bowls of gold, cups of gold, uckets of gold, lead, a sceptre for the king, and spear-hafts."

Here we have a monument erected eight centuries efore the Christian era, which not only supplements he historical records of the Bible, but contains an at-empt at a portrait of Jehu, the king of Israel, who killed Jezebel and threw her body to the dogs.

The story of the siege of Jerusalem by Sennacherib, king of Assyria, is familiar to every Bible reader. You remember that the Assyrian army was encamped at Lachish, while the officers went to Jerusalem to demand the surrender of the city. The most magnificent palace which the spade of the excavator has uncovered in Assyria, belonged to Sennacherib. Upon the wall of the palace was a large bas-relief sculptured with a picture of the Assyrian camp, and with a portrait of the king, seated upon the mountain side at Lachish. Twice in Sennacherib's palace appears the Assyrian account of the siege of Jerusalem. It says:

"I approached Ekron, and I slew with the sword the princes who rebelled against me . . . Hezekiah, king of Judah, did not submit to me. I besieged his cities without number; I captured them, plundered them, and counted them as spoil. I shut him up, like a bird in a cage, in Jerusalem. My majesty overwhelmed Hezekiah and his soldiers; I placed tribute upon him—thirty talents of gold, and three hundred talents of silver. The treasures of his palace, his daughters, and his concubines I took with me to Nineveh."

When the books of the library of Assurbanipal, king of Nineveh, had been taken to the British Museum, George Smith was employed to arrange them. Learning to read the writing upon them, he one day took up the fragment of a broken tablet and read the words: "I released a dove; it flew away, and finding no resting-place returned." Mr. Smith at once recognized that he had discovered the Babylonian story of the flood, and so great was his excitement that he fell senseless to the floor. The London Daily Telegraph sent Mr. Smith to Nineveh to search for the missing fragments of the tablet. He had hardly reached there, and opened excavations in the room of the palace where the library was stored, when he found the fragment he most desired. At the present time several copies of the Plan of the Palace of Sargon

Babylonian story of the flood have come to light. An extract from it reads as follows:

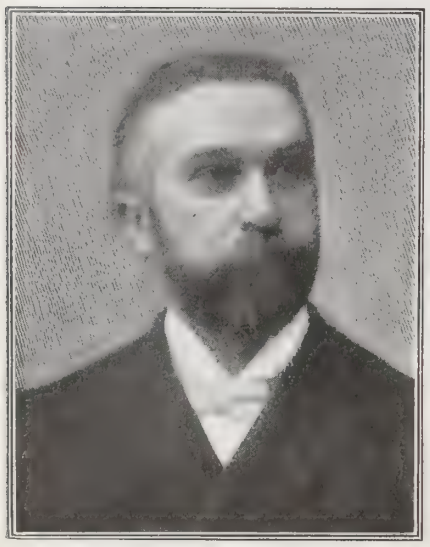
"I collected all the silver which I possessed; I collected all my gold; the seed of life of all kinds I collected. I took everything into the ship,—my slaves, my handmaids, the beasts of the field, the wild animals of the plain, the sons of the people,—I took them in. The god Shamash appointed a season and said that in the night he would cause it to rain from heaven, and that I should enter the ship and shut the door. When the day of which he spoke came, I watched with fear until evening; I entered the ship and closed the door. . . .

"The deluge covered the surface of the earth; it destroyed all living beings, and raging over the people, it reached to heaven. A brother heeded not his brother; men would not help each other. . . . Six days and nights passed; the wind and the rain ceased; the storm which had smitten the earth like an earthquake, was quieted; the sea began to dry, and the deluge was ended. I watched the roaring sea,—all mankind had turned to clay; like reeds their corpses floated upon the water. I opened the window, and the light fell in upon my face. I was grieved, and sat down to weep. At the approach of the seventh day I sent forth a dove; it flew about, and finding no resting-place, returned. I sent forth a swallow; it flew about, and finding no resting-place, returned. I sent forth a raven; it saw the carrion in the water, ate of it and waded about, but did not return. I released the animals, and they went in all directions."

These are but a few of the Bible illustrations which come from the ruins of the palaces of the Assyrian and Babylonian kings. During the past half century, more light has been shed upon the Bible from Babylonian and Assyrian excavations than from all other sources during the past several centuries. To these few illustrations might be added the Babylonian story of the Creation, a description of the Tower of Babel, which still stands near Babylon, the chronology of Babylonia, by which most of the dates of Hebrew history have been accurately determined, and many others. Enough has been said to show that every serious student of the Bible should welcome with gladness the new evidences which the spade of the excavator is revealing, and which Providence has buried until our day.

THE PENDULUM-SWING IN RELIGION

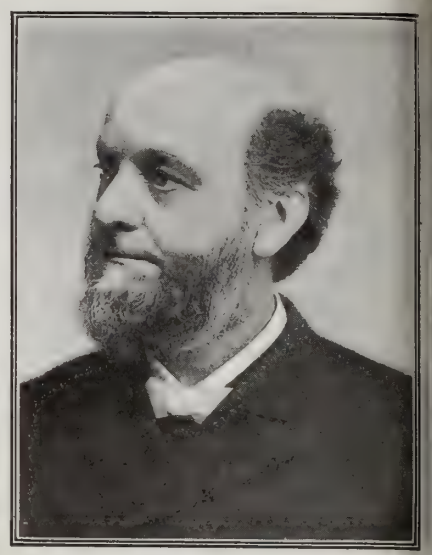
Is it Carrying us Back to Christ and Calvary, or Toward Materialism?



Rev. Teunis S. Hamlin, D.D.

Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D.

Rev. Frank M. Bristol, D.D.



Bishop John H. Vincent, D.D.

WHAT, according to your personal experience and observation, is the present tendency in religion in this country? Is it favorable to new methods and what are called "LIBERAL BELIEFS," or is the pendulum-swing carrying us back to the OLD TIME RELIGION and the Cross of Calvary?

This was the absorbing question submitted by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to the leading preachers and educators of the country, in response to a demand from many different quarters for information on the subject. It was urged that contributors to the Symposium should deal with absolute frankness with religious conditions as they found them.

Among the writers are men eminent in almost every Protestant denomination as pastors or evangelists; also distinguished professors in theological colleges, etc. Their letters cover a wide range of theological thought, and deal without evasion with the great vital questions that affect Christianity, as it is presented to the world to-day.

We will ask our readers to peruse these letters thoughtfully, and shall be pleased to have them write to us afterward, giving their impressions of the general discussion. The letters are given below:

The Religious Tendency South and East

REV. A. F. SCHAUFFLER, NEW YORK CITY MISSION

In the Southern section of our country, the "Old Time Religion" and the "Cross of Calvary" hold the same place as in years gone by. Of the Northwest I am unable to speak. In the Eastern section, there is not much doubt that Congregationalism is, in its ministry, largely permeated by Universalism, and considerably also modified by Unitarianism. This has somewhat dampened aggressive enthusiasm, and will do so more in the future. The destructive "higher criticism" has prevailed considerably in Presbyterian ranks, as well as in those of the Baptist Churches. This to a marked extent affects the preaching, which is very much more ethical and less evangelical than it used to be. At the same time the Northfield influence, and the evangelistic work of the Presbyterian Church, upholds steadily Calvary as the central point, and the Cross as the central truth of the Christian religion.

New Methods and Liberal Belief Not An Unmixed Evil

REV. WALLACE MACMULLEN (M. E.), N. Y.

There is a search for new methods in religious work which is not only legitimate, but necessary. Method is not of eternal but only of temporary value, and ought to change when its usefulness has vanished or been worn dangerously thin. "The old order changeth, yielding place to the new." This is no sign of waning life, but of eager life.

There is a tendency toward liberality in the matter of "belief," if by "belief" you mean an intellectual thing. But such a tendency is not an unmixed evil. Perhaps we ought to say that it is unmixed good. It generally means not hostility to intellectual conclusions, but a protest against the habit of making them supreme in importance. It is an objection not to the existence of beliefs, but to the mere recitation of them. It is an exaltation of conscience above creed, and a plea to have Christian faith regarded not as assent to a lot of intellectual propositions, but as conviction which generates moral and spiritual passion. If this change of emphasis and deeper interpretation which makes "belief" more vital and less glib be "liberality," we can stand more of it. Moreover, some beliefs have ceased to live, the loss of which we cannot mourn.

As to a return to the treasures which are old, there seem to be two opposing tendencies. One party tries to so explain the old facts that the explanations seem to convert the solid verities into vapors. If the apostles had been of this party, we would have had no Christian Church, and no New Testament. Another party, and it is growing both in numbers and in intellectual vigor, is reasserting with an emphasis which is both strong and jubilant, the supernatural Christian truths upon which our souls rest. In their statements there may be some change of form, but the old enduring substance of the Gospel is still found.

There are signs of promise. There is a new insistence upon the Deity and redemption of Jesus, upon the religious supremacy of the Bible. Men are getting more certain of God, duty and immortality. We are full of hope that new floods of spiritual life are waiting to inundate us.

New Ways of Putting the Old Truths

BISHOP JOHN H. VINCENT (M. E.), INDIANAPOLIS

The present tendency among conservative and thoughtful people is, on the whole, progressive and encouraging. One good sign is to be found in the new ways of putting the truth as it is in Christ; ways adapted to the civilization under which we live; in harmony with a more accurate psychology, a higher appreciation of "this life"—of the sacredness of so-called secular relations; a clearer apprehension of the divine immanence; a keener sense of social and political obligations on the part of those who at all believe in "the cross of Christ." An "old-time religion" (by no means attractive title) is greatly to be desired if it be old enough; if it exalt Christ rather than dogma and ceremony and ecclesiasticism; if it restore family discipline, and train children from earliest years in obedience to parents, reverence for the prophet of Nazareth had come to them the new revelation of the Father, and the summons to a new life. When we return to their attitude, and in place of doctrinal tests ask only loyalty to Christ, we shall have their power.

The Battle on between Liberalism and the Old Religion

REV. A. T. PIERSON, NORTHFIELD, MASS.

From one aspect, the tendency is steadily in the direction of a rationalistic liberalism; from the other point, we see a reassertion of the old Gospel and evangelical faith. A man's own surroundings largely influence his opinion. If he is himself "liberal," he consorts with those who promote loose views until the atmosphere seems charged with the "new" opinions; if he is himself immersed in Gospel work, his horizon is largely determined by his absorbing interest in saving souls, and he sees little of the controversies outside.

But the main difficulty in the case, lies in the fact that the very existence and prevalence of liberalism and rationalism promotes emphasis upon evangelical truth—it compels those who see and feel the peril to bear bolder witness, as persecution develops martyrs. The intensest light and shadow always go together. In every period of church history, the reformed faith has been most conspicuously at the front, when the antagonism to it has been more widespread and violent. Hence now the doctrines of the cross must come into new advocacy, because they are assailed.

We Are Going Back to the Simple Apostolic Faith

REV. W. H. P. FAUNCE, PRESIDENT BROWN UNIVERSITY, PROVIDENCE, R. I.

In my opinion, the "pendulum is swinging back" to the simple faith of the first apostles of our Lord. Our age has grown weary of discussion about forms and formulas, and is coming to the position of the men who first preached Christianity around the Mediterranean Sea. Those men, the apostles of our Lord, had no theory of "inspiration," no discussion over the "person of Christ," no doctrine as to the relation of "three persons in one nature," no theory as to the way the world was made. They simply realized that through the Bible and the Church, and impress old and young with the charm and power of a religious life that dominates and cultivates intellect, conscience, affections, will and conduct: three hundred and sixty-five holy days every year.

The Day of Higher Criticism Passing Away

REV. A. C. DIXON (BAPTIST), BOSTON

Among the people there has been little or no "pendulum-swing" away from the Old Time Religion. The swing has been only among a few who have been influenced by the Unitarian apostasy in New England, and the "higher criticism" movement in Germany, assisted by sympathizers with German rationalism in England and America. But Unitarian churches, by the confession of their leaders, are passing, while they comfort themselves with the rather unfraternal reflection that many other churches have caught the contagion of which they themselves are dying.

The Darwinian theory of evolution, the basis of the higher critic vagaries, is now discredited in the scientific world. Prof. Hartman says, "In the eighties Darwin's influence was at its height, and exercised an almost absolute control over technical research. In the nineties, a few expressions of doubt and opposition were heard, and then gradually swelled into a chorus of voices aiming at the overthrow of Darwinian theories. In the first decade of the twentieth century it has become apparent that the days of Darwinism are gone."

Men of learning, like Drs. Emil and Reich, are lecturing in England on "The Bankruptcy of Higher Criticism," and it is evident that the foreclosure upon this academic craze is near at hand. In the evangelical world it has been bankrupt from the beginning, for the preaching of those whose faith in the Bible as God's infallible Word has been wrecked by it has been notably barren of results in conversions. The men who have the ear of the people to-day, like R. A. Torrey, John McNeill, Gipsy Smith, J. Wilbur Chapman, L. W. Munhall, and scores of others in this country, are preaching the "Old Time Religion and the Cross of Calvary." In England these professional evangelists have so made the religious atmosphere and charged it with enthusiasm, that unevangelical pastors have become evangelistic without becoming evangelical, and are reaching out in their efforts to Christianize the masses. But though they have a message to Christians in their preaching of the power of contact with the living Christ and salvation by character, they are helpless when they come to deal with men and women without character, whose very first step in the Christian life must begin at Calvary, with the forgiveness of sins and cleansing of soul, before they can receive any benefit from the life of Christ. The "Old Time Religion" which asserts the fact that man is a sinner and needs regeneration, and proclaims Jesus Christ as Saviour and Lord, is like the old sunlight, new every day, and suited to people of all centuries, races and conditions. Every attempt to make the tallow candle of individual opinion or the electric light of scientific speculations take the place of the sun in the heavens, is doomed to failure.

The Cross Drawing Men as Never Before

Rev. Cortland Myers (Baptist), Brooklyn

There never was an hour when men were feeling the need of Christ so deeply as at this hour. They may not be conscious always of the object of the soul's desire; but it is after Christ, hungry for Christ—that is the condition. Any substitute for the Cross is the mockery of the world's heart now. This is the most prophetic hour. There is no infidelity. This is the day of faith. Men are after this Man of Calvary. God help us to take them down the Damascus Road to the Green Hill.

The Modern Tendency Toward Rational Interpretation

Rev. Amory H. Bradford (Congl.), Montclair, N. J.

So far as I am able to observe, the present tendency in religion is decidedly toward what are called liberal interpretations. Personally I do not like this use of the words "liberal" and "conservative," for they have to do with the spirit with which doctrines are held, rather than with the doctrines themselves.

The tendency of religious thought is not away from the Bible, or the Christ, or the Cross, but it is toward a rational interpretation of these facts. It is away from dogmatism and toward a scientific explanation of the life of man and his relation to the Unseen. The churches are not being forsaken, and men, as a class, are not becoming more irreligious. The outlook was never more hopeful.

AMORY H. BRADFORD.

Temporary Indifference Passing Away

Rev. Russell H. Conwell (Bapt.), Phila.

Mr. Conwell says that it appears certain to him that the indifference of the people towards the Church, as evinced at present, is but a temporary ebb in the tide which has often been felt at almost regularly recurring intervals. The tide has already turned, and the people have decidedly faced towards the old Bible and the old religion, which is always new.

The Real Danger of the Church To-Day

Rev. R. A. Falconer, Presbyterian College, Halifax, N. S.

From what I see and hear I do not believe that men are swinging away from this Gospel of the crucified and risen Jesus Christ. But I do think that the expressions of this belief are changing, and that a reverent learning is leading us back behind the letter to a much fuller knowledge of the living Christ. His promise is being fulfilled that his Spirit will lead us into all the truth. The danger of the Church to-day, in my opinion, lies not in devout and patient scholarship, but in the selfish, ignoble, materialistic lives of those who, while professing to be the disciples of our Lord, will not take up their cross daily and follow him.

A Great Religious Awakening at Hand

Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, Evangelist

Within the past year I have traveled from coast to coast, from Atlanta in the South to the extreme North; have met with all classes and conditions of people; have conferred with thousands of ministers, and I have no hesitation at all in saying that the pendulum is indeed swinging back to the "Old Time Religion." The laymen of the Church seem to be unwilling to receive anything else. I am persuaded that we are on the eve of a great religious awakening.

A Return to Evangelical Truth

Rev. C. L. Goodell, Calvary M. E. Church, New York

There are new methods of church work wherein a distinct return to the principles announced by Jesus, and which cannot do otherwise than bring the church into live-her sympathy with the needs of the people, and hence bring the common people into grateful relations with his church. So far as liberal beliefs are concerned, there is a most pronounced return to evangelical truth. The preaching of the Gospel in a sane, hopeful and tender way, is filling our churches. People are coming to Christ. More than seven hundred have joined my own church during the last year.

Is Orthodoxy Undergoing a Reconstruction?

Rev. W. R. Huntington (Episcopal), N. Y.

There can be no question at all that what may be called the distinctively Protestant doctrine, with respect to the Holy Scriptures, has undergone, and is still undergoing, noticeable change.

Some hold that the observation of this fact is sure to throw conservative minds, in great numbers, back upon church authority as a substitute for the authority of an "inspired book." Others, however, and I count myself among them, firmly believe that what we are to be thrown back upon is the authority of the personal Christ, whose teaching about himself and us, handed on to us and preserved for us by the Church of the Ages, stands unaffected by the new knowledge of which we are hearing so much. The Christian religion is getting itself restated, in terms, this time, of personality and of life. Henceforth, religion will demand of men somewhat less of assent and somewhat more of allegiance.

That Christianity will ever wholly lose its dogmatic characteristics I cannot believe; but that it will hereafter lean more to the reason and less to the understanding, to use Coleridge's familiar antithesis, I am convinced. This does not mean a triumph of "Liberalism," though it may mean, to a certain extent, the reconstruction of "Orthodoxy."

Come what may, the Apostles' Creed, as a portrait of the Divine-human Saviour in whom we trust, will stand.

The Pendulum is Swinging Back to Calvary

Rev. D. J. Burrell (Cong'l), New York

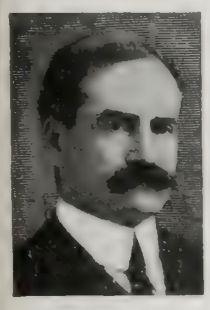
WHAT IS "DAILY BIBLE"?



Wilbert W. White, Ph.D.

DAILY BIBLE is a monthly magazine, with a purpose and a plan unique in the field of religious journalism. It recognizes in the average Christian a desire for more of a sense of reality in the religious life; for more consciousness of the fact that God is to him personally a living, loving, guiding, sustaining Father. It recognizes that in thousands of Christian homes there is a desire for the daily recognition of God, and for the uplift and cheer which come into the home life with the regular observance of family worship. It recognizes, too, that a difficulty has stood in the way of the satisfaction of both these desires; the difficulty which the average Christian and the average family experience when, with but a limited amount of time at their disposal, they attempt to read the Bible devotionally. Explain it as we may, the difficulty is there; they do not get what they want; they know the help, the cheer is there, but it eludes them.

The success of Daily Bible in overcoming this difficulty is attested by the fact that to-day, in thousands of Christian homes, its use is making possible the systematic reading of the Bible with a sense of relish and of profit that were not before known.

Following is a very brief outline of the essential features of Daily Bible for the year 1906:

FIRST—By J. R. Miller, D.D., of Philadelphia, a series of daily notes, embracing in three hundred and sixty-five days the entire New Testament; simple and devotional in character, designed for the family circle and for the hurried private student. These notes, while simple in character, provide just that help and stimulus that are needed to sustain interest in the daily devotions.

SECOND—By Wilbert W. White, Ph.D., President of the Bible Teachers' Training School of New York City, a series of daily notes, following day by day the same schedule as above, but of more advanced grade; designed for the private student who desires to give more time to his devotions, and to acquire in a comprehensive way the results of the latest scholarship in Biblical analysis and interpretation.

S. D. Gordon

THIRD—By S. D. Gordon of Cleveland, author of Quiet Talks on Power, and of Quiet Talks on Prayer, a monthly article designed to help, in a real and practical way, in the application of Scripture truth to the daily life.

J. Wilbur Chapman, D.D.

FOURTH—By J. Wilbur Chapman, D.D., of New York City, a monthly department that shall express from a non-sectarian standpoint, the evangelistic spirit of the times; that shall instruct and train young Christians in principles and methods of personal service. If we may so speak, the daily notes by Dr. Miller and Dr. White, will lay emphasis on the development of the inner life of the Christian; Dr. Chapman's department will lay emphasis on its outward expression. Published monthly, in magazine form, at [illegible] a year.

Revival Meetings

THE winter now upon us is to be signalized all over our country by a concerted endeavor on the part of Christians to make a deep impression on the outside world, to bring the indifferent and the hostile into closer touch with Christ, so that their apathy may be overcome, and their hostility conquered, and to kindle in all hearts a new and better life.

It is a magnificent enterprise on which Christendom is launching its combined forces, a great and glorious campaign for the Prince of Peace. At these revival meetings which are multiplying over the land, so that they seem like beacon fires lighted everywhere in dark places, we sing with one accord:

The Son of God goes forth to war,
A kingly crown to gain;
His blood-red banner streams afar:
Who follows in his train?

But, though Jesus said, "I came not to send peace on earth, but a sword," still his sword of conquest has for its proud distinction the victories of a divine peace.

There are Christian men and women who keep out of the current of this warm and glowing life, who stand aloof shivering on the brink of doubts and prejudices when they might be bathed in the Gulf Stream of a tropical love. They say they do not believe in the Bible, they criticize methods, they deprecate the extraordinary, and declare that the usual means of grace should be sufficient for every one. Nevertheless, in every age since Pentecost, the Church has witnessed mighty revivals, and they have had the attestation of the Holy Spirit in the conversion of men, the uplifting of the public conscience, and the sweetening of home life.

The way to treat revival meetings is neither to sneer at nor condemn them, but to place one's self where the good that is in them may be potential and may have a chance to affect the personal conduct. Revivals to succeed must begin with professing Christians. The cares of this world, the deceitfulness of riches or the iron pressure of poverty may have choked the spiritual life. Clear away the ashes. Turn on the draughts. Let your own life toward God have an opportunity to spring up anew.

The President and the Corporations

THAT is a difficult problem which the President set before Congress in his message, of the control of the great corporations. Of the urgency of the problem there can be no two opinions. Recent disclosures have proved that strict supervision and control are necessary. Hitherto the country has felt that the less interference there is with business enterprises by the government the better. But the corporations have become too powerful. They are fast becoming a menace to the public welfare. Controlling vast accumulations of capital, they are able to buy up the State Legislatures, or to defy them. They have become a law to themselves. Any protest against unfair discrimination, or any resistance to their will, involves long and costly litigation, with doubtful results. They are able, by combination, to shut out competition and create a monopoly inimical to the public interest. As Mr. Roosevelt says, "they occupy the position of subjects without a sovereign." They recognize no restraint but that of their own conscience, and as we have learned from the recent inquiry, that restraint is of the lightest and flimsiest kind. The power they have acquired is used to lay the heaviest burdens on the public, that the directors may become millionaires. Even the shareholders do not get their fair share of the profits of the enterprise, but, like the general public, have to yield to the greed of the men at the head, who manipulate the accumulated funds for their own private benefit.

It is time that measures were taken to check this dangerous power, otherwise the country may fall under the power of an oligarchy that will stifle its very life. The President asks Congress to devise such measures. He thinks it can deal with the problem more effectively than can the State Legislatures. He believes that the aim of Congress should be "by legislation, cautiously and carefully undertaken, but resolutely persevered in, to assert the sovereignty of the National Government." He insists that this sovereignty would not be an innovation, but a restoration of effective authority over matters that have developed with our civilization. Whether Congress has the ability, or the disposition, to deal wisely with so complicated a problem, may be doubted; but the President has done well to call its attention to the situation, and to point out the dangers with which it is fraught.

A Contest of Weather Prophets

URGED by his philanthropic desire to increase the public knowledge of meteorology, a gentleman in New York recently offered a prize for the best series of weather predictions extending over a given time. The response went far ahead of his fondest hopes. The amateur weather prophets sent in their results by the thousand and by the yard. Some sent them every day; others would collect a month's predictions and then send them on to the gentleman who had inspired, or reinspired, their scientific enthusiasm. The postman, staggering under his load of letters and parcels, began to think that every day was Christmas Day at the scientist's.

The trouble within the household was no less intense. Half buried beneath a few thousand responses, predictions to right of him, predictions to left of him, the great investigator knew the sufferings experienced by Andrew Carnegie, Laird of Skibo, after he had announced that it was a shame for anyone, especially the Laird of Skibo aforesaid, to die rich. What the scientist's wife thought we will leave to the feminine readers of this paper. Some of the contestants made their forecasts in a scientific manner. Others in the good old way of weather guessers. One would draw learned conclusions from the strength of the automobilic "honk," "honk" of the geese flying southward overhead; another from the manner in which hens dressed their feathers, something, as all the world knows, common to daughters of Eve, and that the only thing it presages is a new hat. The contest was won by a man in Chicago, who, relying only on his own observations of the moon's phases, and general atmospheric conditions, scored an average of over ninety-six per cent, while the Weather Bureau, with its costly equipment, had scored but sixty-three.

Notwithstanding its funny side, it all shows an active and hearty interest in the why and the wherefore of this great universe of ours, and from the real searchers after truth we receive daily additions to our stores of knowledge. An astronomer in Switzerland, M. C. Marti, has developed a theory that the conjunctions of the planets affect our atmospheric conditions, and the pamphlet he has written gives many interesting facts in support of his ideas. It is a noteworthy fact that this view was also held by some of the ancient astronomers, but was thrown aside at the time when people had got it into their heads that anything ancient must be wrong, from a scientific standpoint. "Only planets with dense atmospheres seem to affect the weather," says M. Marti, "Mercury, Venus, Jupiter, Saturn, and Uranus." The moon and Mars, however, seem to have no effect on the rainfall. It would be interesting if M. Marti proves that the men of science of ancient days were on the right track, and that the moderns had been switched off by their contempt for all that was old, and a mad desire to find only new and untrodden paths of research.

The Religious Outlook

WHAT is the tendency of religious thought in America to-day? Is it true, as many have asserted, that we are coming, as a people, more and more under the influence of what are known as "liberal beliefs," and tending towards Materialism, Unitarianism, Universalism? Or, amid all the changes and perturbations incident to the scientific, social and philosophic development of the last two or three decades, do we still hold fast, as a whole, to the Cross of Calvary and the essentials of Christianity, as laid down by the great Master and his apostles?

This was the absorbing question which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, as representing, perhaps, the greatest body of earnest readers of any religious journal in the world, submitted to the leading theologians of practically all the Protestant denominations, inviting them to state the situation precisely as it appeared to them as teachers, preachers, and men who, in various capacities, come daily into contact with people of all shades of religious opinion. We are glad to observe, as the result of this inquiry, that those who are at the helm, and in the best position to diagnose the tendency of the times, are virtually united in the conviction that the general drift is in the direction of a more devout and sincere belief in Christ and Christianity. All the impediments which the enemies of the faith set up have been transformed into blessings. Out of the great struggle which brought to the surface the higher critics, the evolutionists, the anti-inspirationists and a host of other assailants of the old Book, have come a clearer atmosphere, a more soul-satisfying view, and a truer estimate of the sacred personality and mission of Jesus than ever before. Eminent scholarship, honest criticism, and earnest investigation, however much they may have militated against tradition, and whatsoever misconceptions and mistakes, made almost venerable by time, they may have exploded, have nevertheless resulted in a net gain to Christianity. They have aided materially in giving us a clearer and nearer view of Christ and a better appreciation of his teachings.

Even those among the contributors to the Symposium, who differ in some immaterial details from other contributors, concur in declaring that the new presentation of the old Gospel, being freed from monkish legend and from literalism, is more practical than the old and of greater value as an aid to a spiritual life. It is not in reality a new Gospel, but a broadening and enlargement of the spirit and interpretation of apostolic times; a presentation of Christ to the longing eyes of the men and women of the Twentieth Century, not as a figure veiled in mystery and hidden in tradition, but as he really was and is: the Divine One, who came to the world to bring life and immortality to light, and who is able to-day to save to the uttermost.

Thus, after all, what we are now facing in the new development of theological thought, is substantially a clearer modernized restatement of the old vital truths, some of which were but partially comprehended in the early days of the Christian church, when the simple teachings of Jesus had been obscured by innumerable traditions. The essentials of the faith were mystified rather than simplified by the vast mass of dogmatic theology which came afterward. Happy the age in which the last of these cobwebs shall be swept away, and when the "Light of the world" shall shine clear and undimmed, to the saving and guiding of the nations.

AMONG THE WORKERS

—EVANGELIST E. R. HERMISTON has lately been conducting a successful revival in Portland, Oregon, in connection with the Y.M.C.A. and local churches.

—IT IS CLAIMED that Dr. Torrey and Rev. Mr. Alexander, the American evangelists, have made 102,000 converts during their three years' crusade in Great Britain.

—EVANGELIST C. R. HAUDENSCHIELD has just closed a remarkable meeting at Kirksville, Mo. One hundred persons definitely accepted Christ, and eighty united with the church.

—EVANGELIST E. A. FERGERSON, during the last three months has conducted revival gatherings in Kentucky, Alabama, Florida, and several other States. In the winter months he will conduct religious work in Troy, O., and Salem, N. C.

—THE Y. M. C. A. is arranging to break into the Arctic Circle. Early next spring it will have an army secretary, with a launch, on the Yukon river, visiting the military posts. The pioneer in this work is William A. Reid, an experienced dog-sledge and snow-shoe traveler.

—MESSRS. CROSSLEY & HUNTER, the Canadian evangelists, have just closed a gratifying campaign in Owen Sound, Ontario, in which one thousand and seven men, women and youths enlisted for Christ. All the evangelical churches and pastors heartily united iu the services.

—DR. HANNAH Y. JACOBS, the well-known medical missionary in Persia, writes from Tabriz to this journal: "In this land of Persia, a Christian missionary is now welcomed everywhere with open arms by all classes, from the Shah to the peasant." Dr. Jacobs appeals for help for her medical work in Tabriz.

The BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Jews in Mourning Parade

SELDOM, if ever, has New York witnessed a spectacle so impressive as that of Dec. 4, when the Jews of New York left their homes and their work to demonstrate their sorrow for their slaughtered brethren in Russia. For fully two hours, there was a continuous stream of people marching four abreast up Broadway. There were women as well as men in the line, their garments, in many cases, showing that sympathy had reached down to the lowest ranks of the toilers. At a conservative estimate there were 125,000 persons in line, some carrying cheap banners, and many with a band of crape around their arms. The procession was marshalled in societies, of which there were ninety-five. Among them was the Kishineff Organization, composed of survivors of the massacre of Kishineff. There were trades unions, professional associations, and musical societies. Nearly all wore the now familiar badge of the Stars and Stripes crossed with the flag of Zion, the blue six-pointed star of David. At intervals there was a band playing a solemn dirge, and occasionally a society would break out in a chant, but otherwise the thousands marched in sad silence, with downcast faces. As the companies passed through the East Side, on their way to join the procession on Broadway, there were brief halts at the various synagogues, and a rabbi appeared with hands raised in supplication, the responses coming from the marching throng. As the procession entered Union Square, there was danger of a crush in which many might have been injured; but when the square was filled, the line was halted until the resolutions were passed, and the throng had dispersed to the various synagogues. Then the remainder of the procession marched around the square and separated. The resolutions deplored the massacres, and called upon the United States Government, and upon "all the governments of enlightened lands to enter their protest against the criminal slaughter of innocent persons, and against the brutal massacres which violate all laws of humanity, and put all progress of nations to shame." They were read in English and in Yiddish, and were answered with a loud shout of "Aye."

At Temple Emanu-el, as at the other synagogues, an impressive service was held, at which Dr. Silverman, the chief rabbi, called attention to the spirit of brotherhood expressed by the great demonstration. "Israel," he said, "demonstrated its unity by this sublime expression of its sorrow. The mourning was for those who had perished, because to them their religion was a reality. We have still a hope," he said, "that the conscience of the world may be aroused, and that from every pulpit in the world a united Christian chorus of protest will go forth that will shake unholy Russia to her foundations, and cause her to cease her fiendish work." Other speakers dwelt on the magnificent generosity which had raised a million dollars for the relief of the sufferers, and expressed the hope that in the new day that is dawning for Russia, the Jew might be among the leaders who are working for the deliverance of the whole Russian people. May the time soon come when the promise of God to his ancient people through the prophets shall be fulfilled:

They shall no more be a prey to the heathen, but they shall dwell safely, and none shall make them afraid (Ezek. 34 : 28).

The President's Message

That the President has clear and decided views as to the course Congress should pursue, and is very much in earnest in advocating his views, is evident from his message. That there will be a difference of opinion among statesmen as to the wisdom of his policy, is natural, but all will give him credit for his honesty and candor in stating his attitude. It is impossible to summarize in a brief paragraph a document of 26,000 words, but the chief recommendations may be concisely stated. They are: The enactment of a law giving the government power to supervise and control railroad and other corporations; a better system of regulating immigration; improvement of our naturalization laws; a reform of our methods of election; an investigation of the conditions of labor; an increase in the efficiency of the navy, and at the same time a sincere effort to reduce the number of the causes that involve war; and an emergency appropriation for the Panama canal. Many other topics were included in the Message, but it was on those mentioned above that the President laid the greatest stress. If Congress deals with only a small part of the work planned for it by the President, it will have a busy session. It will earn the respect and good-will of the nation if it lays aside for the time party struggles, and emulates the statesmen of ancient times by enacting laws that are needed by the changed condition of our social life.

Men that had understanding of the times to know what Israel ought to do (I. Chron. 12: 32).

Through the Northwest Passage

Astonishing news comes from Fort Egbert, Alaska. The Northwest passage, vainly sought for four centuries, has at last been navigated. The first vessel to pass across the North of the American Continent, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, is the Gjoa, commanded by Captain Roland Amundsen. He sailed from Norway in June, 1903. Entering Davis Strait, he passed to the north of Baffin Land, through the Arctic Archipelago, to the coast of Alaska. He left his vessel to winter at King Point, whence it will easily pass through Behring Strait into the Pacific. Thus the search which John Cabot began in 1497, and which has involved the loss of many lives, has been achieved by a little vessel manned by only eight sailors. The first station of the expedition was at Godhaven, Greenland. Later, they reached Leopold Harbor, and set up their magnetic instruments on King William Island. From that point, Amundsen definitely located the Magnetic Pole, which was the chief object of his expedition. A pathetic feature of the discovery is the fact, that the explorers found a monument erected by the famous expedition under Sir John Franklin. It showed that the identical passage, through which Amundsen has now sailed, was actually discovered fifty-seven years ago by the famous expedition led by Sir John Franklin. The gallant explorers had found the passage, had seen the shores of the American continent in the distance, but had been unable to force their ships through the ice between them and the outlet to the Pacific. They had triumphed, but perished of cold and hunger before they could announce their discovery to the world. It is such tragedies as this that lead even unbelievers to accept the doctrine of a future life. Eternal justice demands that the disappointments and failures of this world should be rectified, and men receive the fair reward of their labors and sufferings. But it would have been an idle hope if Christ had not revealed it to the world.

Who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light (II. Timothy 1: 10).

MOURNING PARADE OF 125,000 HEBREWS IN NEW YORK, IN MEMORY OF THE RUSSIAN MASSACRES

Temperance in Court

A police magistrate in St. Louis, Mo., has adopted a new method in dealing with men brought before him on the charge of drunkenness. He does not use it with habitual drunkards, believing that in their case it would be useless, but with the other kind he adopts it. When the man is convicted he passes the usual sentence, but offers to suspend it if the offender will sign the following declaration, printed copies of which the judge has ready on his desk: "As evidence of my appreciation of the opportunity given me by the judge of this court to become a sober and better citizen, in staying the fine imposed upon me this day, I hereby freely and voluntarily sign the following pledge, that I will abstain from the use of intoxicating liquors for the period of one year." The judge says that this is better than punishing the man, and indirectly his family, for his offence. The result has been satisfactory thus far, as the signers who have broken their pledge are less than one per cent. of the whole number whose sentences were suspended. The judge is as wise as he is merciful, and he follows Christ's own principle.

If he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother (Matt. 18: 15).

New Jersey's Religious Tidal Wave

GREAT GATHERINGS IN MANY CITIES—MIDNIGHT MEETINGS AND GOSPEL SERVICES IN SALOONS

An evangelistic revival is now sweeping over the larger cities of New Jersey like a tidal wave. Enthusiastic meetings are being held not only in the churches, but in theatres, halls, and even in drinking saloons, police courts, and jails. All classes of people have become imbued, more or less, with the spirit of the Gospel, from the regular church-goer to the poor, wayfaring habitue of the low drinking dives, who for years has been a stranger to religion. Rev. Dr. Wilbur F. Chapman's methods are such, that his words, and those of his corps of helpers go straight to the hearts of their hearers. Dr. Chapman's plan of holding services in the theatres after the evening performances, has resulted, in many instances, in gathering midnight audiences composed of people who could not be reached at any other time of the day or night.

Jersey City was the scene of the revivalists' work for a number of days, and great hopes are entertained of the permanency of the impressions made for good among the people. Large audiences were attracted and much interest awakened. The practical side of religion, as applied to business life, was the theme of the Rev. Charles Stelzle, who preached a few days ago in a large factory in Jersey City at the noon hour. The men gathered in one of the work-rooms, the numerous machines and other paraphernalia of the factory making an odd setting for a religious meeting.

A Gospel Gathering in a New Jersey Saloon

Evangelist Strouse, in an address in a leading church in Jersey City, spoke on "Honesty as a Requisite to True Christianity." "No crooked business methods are tolerated in the realm of true Christianity," he said, "no matter how small or insignificant the transaction may be; absolute honesty is required of all true followers of Christ. A man who goes into shady transactions will have to reap what he is sowing," he continued. "A fellow who will take his property and put it into his wife's name, so that he does not have to pay his debts, is a thief." The speaker concluded: "It is a crime for an employer to work a boy or girl for the least amount of money possible. Many a youth has gone wrong because he was underpaid for his work."

One of the most interesting features connected with the revival has been the services conducted by the Rev. William Asher and Mrs. Asher, who have held meetings in saloons, police courts and jails. The great wave of religious enthusisam which has swept over these cities of New Jersey has carried men of all creeds and denominations on its crest. It seem almost paradoxical that saloon-keeper should open their doors to the evangelists; but such is the power of the earnest desire to benefit their fellow creatures, which has actuated the Ashers, that men have stood packed closely together in saloons, night after night, and listened to the Gospel spoken and sung by these devoted evangelists. They came from the West where, for some time, they were missionary workers under the guidance of Rev. Frank DeWitt Talmage. Their method in holding these meetings is very simple, and they never fail to gain a respectful hearing. Mr. Asher mounts a chair, saying: "Now, men, I'm with you, and I hope you're with me in this work of making men better. I will ask Mrs. Asher to sing." Opening a little folding organ, which the saloon-keepers of the West presented to the evangelists, Mrs. Asher, in a sweet, persuasive voice, sings, "The King's Message," "The Mother's Prayer," or some good old Moody and Sankey hymn, at the same time asking her audience to join in the chorus. This the men always do with a will, after the little woman has sung a verse or two. After the singing, Mr. Asher reads a few verses from the Bible, and then proceeds to give the men some good advice.

In Jersey City, a dingy police court became a scene of religious worship, led by the Ashers, the congregation being made up of prisoners, policemen, and spectators. The unfortunate prisoners were brought in half an hour ahead of time. They made a pathetic showing, standing in the dock.

During the present month, the entire corps of evangelists and helpers, under the leadership of Dr. Chapman, will continue the spiritual campaign in New Jersey on aggressive lines. A great harvest of souls is confidently hoped for.

The Immigration Congress

GOVERNORS of States, congressmen, philanthropists, and men prominent in all walks of life, gathered this month in Madison Square Garden, New York, at the invitation of the Civic Federation, to discuss the question of immigration.

The sessions were held in the white concert hall, which had been draped with the flags of the country to which the results of this Immigration Congress means so much. When August Belmont, President of the Federation, called the first meeting to order, there were about him on the platform, Oscar Strauss, Samuel Gompers, of the American Federation of Labor; President Eliot, of Harvard; Frank Sargent, Commissioner of Immigration; and seated before him, delegates from every State in the Union. These delegates had been appointed by governers of their States, chambers of commerce and religious bodies. In few assemblies would you find the same interest in the subject in hand, such grasp of facts and statistics in debate, as was found here.

The great speech of the gathering was delivered by Commissioner Sargent, one of our foremost authorities on what may be justly called the most difficult problem now confronting the American people. He showed that the character of our immigration was constantly changing, only about 60,000 coming from Ireland, against over 200,000 from Austria-Hungary. "Last year, was the banner year," he said, "with 1,026,000 arrivals; not counting those from Canada and Mexico. Of this number, six States, New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Illinois, New Jersey and Ohio, received 76 per cent. of the whole; while to the glorious West—that great open country—only 43,571 immigrants found their way. The South, now starting on a wonderful career of commercial prosperity, received but 46,343. Why this inequality of distribution? Because the alien goes where he has friends. We should have agents in Europe who would inform intending immigrants of the resources and advantages in various parts of our country, so that they would not congest our cities. I would send them West, and only have them come back to New York when they had a pocket full of money, to spend it. About 1,200 were returned last year as unfit. It was right that they should be returned, but wrong that they should ever have been allowed to start from home.

During the Congress the delegates were taken to Ellis Island, in New York harbor, to see the actual working of the greatest immigration station in the world. Some were put through the same examination as would fall to a newly-arrived passenger in the steerage, greatly to the delight of their fellow delegates. The examiners asked about their moral character, reasons for coming here, and how much money they had. Here they had to pass over their money to the inspectors, who counted it, and, according to the same methods applied to immigrants, handed it back. The detention cases were naturally of the greatest interest, as they showed the delegates with what specimens of humanity the immigration officials have to deal. They were given a dinner of the sort served to new arrivals.

At one of the later sessions, Andrew Carnegie delivered one of his characteristic speeches, and took the somewhat untenable ground that we wanted all the immigrants we could get, and from all countries, and practically without restriction, except in the case of criminals.

Looking Backward*

LIFE is an education. The man who passes through the years unthinking, unobservant, is like a boy at school who neglects his lessons and spends his time in idleness and play. We tell such a boy that the time will come when he will mourn over his wasted opportunities, and that he will find himself maimed and crippled in the struggle of life. There will be openings that he might use, places he might fill, money he might earn, and he will be unable to take advantage of the opportunities, because he is not equipped for the service. We understand this, because the results are near to us, and we see examples of such negligence every day, but we fail to give the warning its wider application. It has always been so. The passage associated with the topic gives an illustration. These Israelites had been forty years at school. They were about to enter their new land, and their safety and prosperity depended on whether they would remember the lessons they had been taught.

We know how it all ended. The world sees to-day in the outcast race, a people without a home, the consequences of neglecting to learn those lessons of the wilderness. The characteristics they had shown in their weary wanderings, they continued to display in their new environment. Time and again they were warned; again and again heavy afflictions were laid upon them; pestilence, captivity, massacre, were sent upon them, but they would not learn. Like Pharaoh in Egypt, they went back to their sins as soon as their plague was removed. Finally they were scattered over the face of the earth, to feel in every land the hatred and the jealousy of every people.

With such a warning before us, shall we copy their faults? God deals with the individual as with the nation, and there is no rest nor peace for the soul that opposes him. It is the law of our being, that sin brings punishment. Cause and effect work in our lives, and the curse causeless does not come. To the disobedient child, the rod is applied; to the disobedient man, sorrow and suffering come. The purpose is the same—to produce repentance and amendment. What irony God must see in the spectacle of the father beating his child for lying or stealing, and then going out himself to lie and cheat in his business! We wonder as we read Jewish history, that the nation should be so incorrigible, but are we a whit better? In our own lives, and in the lives of others, we have seen what a sad and bitter thing sin is, yet we cling to it and persist in committing it. We do not learn our lesson.

At the close of the year, we look back over its events, and ask ourselves what progress we have made. Have our sufferings and sorrows taught us anything? Has the prosperity we have enjoyed, made us grateful to God and more determined to live by his rule? Everything that comes to us has a message and is intended as discipline. It is wasted, if it is simply endured, without recognizing its meaning. We are still at school, and our lessons are often hard to learn, but we may be sure they are worth learning. There are some of us who are tried by prosperity, and some by adversity, but our loving Father deals out both, as he sees the need of our nature. We should mistake, if we supposed that the bitter is always punishment. It is sometimes administered, because it is the only way in which we will learn the lesson that we need. The chief thing is that we do learn the lesson, and do not content ourselves with simple patience. "It doth not yet appear what we shall be," but we can trust Him in whose hand are all our ways. We know that in that vast and mysterious future, we shall have need of the qualities that our experience here is developing in us.

A Pastor's Novel Idea

REV. T. J. O'CONNOR, pastor of the First Christian Church, Eldora, Iowa, believes in the free use of printer's ink, in giving publicity to the work in which he is engaged. The Eldora newspapers came out recently with the following advertisement, in big display type, set in the most prominent part of the newspaper:

ETERNAL LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY.
Home Office: Heavenly City, New Jerusalem.
President, - - THE LORD JESUS.
Capital.
GOD'S EVERLASTING LOVE.

I am one of the many representatives of this Great Company in this community.

Here's where I will be glad to have you call on me at the CHURCH OF CHRIST, on Lord's Day, at 11 A.M. and 7:30 P.M., or at my home any time through the week.

The firm assures you peace and joy here and in the next world a life of everlasting blessedness—blessedness without alloy, without interruption, without end.

No certificate of health necessary.

Three Jewish Heroes

By Mrs M. Baxter

THREE remarkable men are brought before us in Jewish history: Daniel the prophet, Ezra the teaching priest, and Nehemiah the godly governor. Daniel was placed in a position of great difficulty in a heathen court. He could not fly, as Elijah did, far from the haunts of men to Mount Horeb, where he could commune with God utterly uninterrupted. Daniel had no privacy but his room, probably on the street, with all the hum of city life, and, no doubt, numberless interruptions. It takes much more faith, much more resolution, much more continuous communion with God, to be intense in all the turmoil of public life, than in the retirement of the brookside, or the wild, lonely mountain. The instinct to get away alone with God, which comes when a burden of the Lord is upon us, may fade and droop when pressing duties and unexpected calls, demanding immediate attention, stand in the way.

And the life of a public man is in itself public. Men know where he goes and what he does. It is no easy matter for such a man to hide himself away, alone with God. And yet Daniel knew that his very spiritual existence depended upon it; and he maintained his habit of communion with God alone, three times a day, through all the pressure and claims upon him. It must often have happened that some sudden call came while he was in prayer; and his servant would have to tell the messenger that his master was engaged with a Mightier than their master, though he might be the proud Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar, or Darius. It takes courage for a man who lives before the public to put God first; yet only so can a true witness be borne to him who says to his people, "Ye are my witnesses, saith Jehovah, that I am God."

Ezra, the priest, had difficulties of another order. He, too, was a man much occupied; a deep student of the Word of God, a man of prayer, zealous for his God, and a soul-winner of his time. Judah was in his days much as we are in ours; the lukewarmness described in the Epistle to the Laodiceans (Rev. 3: 16) had its counterpart in the priest and Levites, the rulers and the elders of God's people in Ezra's day. To serve God, he must not only be much in communion with him, but also he must be faithful at any cost to God and to the people, at the risk of being unpopular. How many pastors and teachers in the present day cater for popularity among the people, by having services adapted to please man, and which have the effect of making people pleased with themselves and with their pastor! And the precious opportunity of leading these souls to a knowledge of themselves and of the salvation of their God, through faith in the blood of Christ, slips away, never to return. Sin and worldliness remain unrebuked, and God remains unglorified. Ezra was not such an one. Like Micah (3: 8) he was "full of power by the Spirit of the Lord, and of judgment and of might, to declare unto Jacob his transgression, and to Israel his sin."

And Nehemiah, too, was an unusual ruler. He answered much to the description given by David (II. Sam. 23: 3), "He that rules over men must be just, ruling in the fear of God." It was this rule in the fear of God, which was the chief characteristic of Nehemiah. Diffident about his own wisdom, and fully persuaded of the wisdom of his God, Nehemiah continually made prayer to him, and depended on him for direction. Hence the special wisdom which was given him. Who can tell all the blessing these three men were to their generation? or how many there may be who will rise up and call them blessed? Who can compute how many young men may have been stirred up to believe in, to love, and serve God, by the example of Daniel.

CAPTIVES LED TO CHRIST

SUNDAY SCHOOL REVIEW LESSON

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

Bas-Relief of Cyrus

Assyrian Cup-Bearer

ON this last day of the fifth year of the new century, in which God has been moving the people to revivals of civic righteousness, the review text is indeed golden. "In all thy ways acknowledge him, and he shall direct thy paths" (Prov. 3: 6). The quarter's lessons, beginning with the captivity and ending with the prophecies of Christ, are themselves an illustration of the Christian's "path," starting in captivity to sin, ending in the fellowship of Christ.

The first lesson pictures the physical, the second the mental chains of sin's captivity. Belshazzar's drunkenness and debauchery, bad as they were, were not so mean as the envy and hatred of the respectable officials who caused Daniel to be sent to the lion's den. The story of Daniel and the lions recalls that the king of Abyssinia had heard of Julius Seth's prowess as a lion-tamer, and asked him for a proof of his skill. He had twenty-eight lions captured for him, and in due time Mr. Seth turned them over to the king, having gotten them under perfect control. After proof of the skill of the trainer he made him a present of the lot, worth about $2,000 apiece. This is the way the Lord deals with us. He says to us, "You may have all the lions you tame. You may have all of Canaan you conquer. You may have all the character you can acquire." Our sins of body and mind are the first things to "acknowledge," if we would have God "direct" our lives. When sin is forgiven there is taken away the fear of death, which appalled Belshazzar when the hand wrote upon the wall, and which Daniel did not feel even in the lion's den, for "the sting of death is sin."

The Assyrian Deity, Ashur

There are more tests of courage in life than in death. A bright young Jewess had been converted. She was an out and out Christian, the only one in her home, but as she supported the home they couldn't very well turn her out of it. She was working for one of the best known firms in Chicago, and after her conversion she at once went to work to lead others to Christ. One day the manager called her up and said: "Miss So-and-So, I hear you are talking Christ to all the other employees." "Yes," she replied, "I am." He said, "Well, you mustn't do it. We will not interfere with your religion; we don't object to it; Christianity is a good thing, but you must not talk it around the office." "Very well," said she, "if I cannot take Jesus Christ with me to the office I'll leave it, for I cannot work where I have to be disloyal to Christ." She went on with her work and her testimony for Christ, expecting every day to get her dismissal. At the end of the week a letter came from the manager. "Here's my dismissal," she thought, as she tore open the envelope. She read, "Dear Miss—, We have a position that has just become vacant, a position of great trust and responsibility, with a better salary than you are now receiving. We think you are just the one to fill it, and I am authorized to offer it to you." "Dare to be a Daniel."

"Returning from Captivity" vividly pictures the repentance, the conversion, the turning and returning, by which sin's captives come back to Christ.

> Out of my bondage, sorrow and night
> Jesus, I come, Jesus, I come:
> Into thy freedom, gladness and light,
> Jesus, I come to thee.—Geo. C. Stebbins.

Regeneration is God's part, creating a new heart; but repentance is our part. Not primarily a sorrow of the heart, but a turning of the will to God. During the American Civil War, after a revival service in a tent, a young soldier who got into the army under age was among the inquirers who remained for conversation.

"Did you ever go to Sunday School?" "Yes, always." "Have you a mother?" "She was a Christian. She has gone to heaven long ago." "Well, why are you not a Christian, Tom?" "That's just what I stopped for—to find out how." "What did Paul say to the jailer? 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ.'" "I have heard that a great many times, but somehow, I don't know how to do it." "Suppose your lieutenant would send for you to-night, what would you do? When you came to his quarters, what would you say?" "I'd report, give him the salute, and say, 'Lieutenant, what's the orders?'" "Well, now, Tom, the Lord Jesus has sent me to you to-night, and orders you to report to him at once." "I'll do it, I'll do it, sir;" and the little fellow looked around for his hat as if he were going. I asked him of his companions. He told me of an irreligious bunk-mate. "Tom, if you are going to be a Christian, don't you think Jesus will want you to talk and pray with that bunk-mate to-night?" "Yes, if a fellow's going to serve Jesus, he must take hold of it." "Well, exactly what Jesus wants you to do—that's the order. And don't you think, too, that he wants you to write to your sister in the morning, and tell her how you feel and what you are going to do?" "Certainly." "Well, that's the orders, Tom; and so you'll find it all along in life."

But repentance is only getting back to our ruined Jerusalem, where we must build laboriously a Christian character and reputation.

> A house is built of bricks and stones, of sills and posts and piers,
> But a home is built of loving deeds that stand a thousand years.
> A house, though but a humble cot, within its walls may hold
> A home of priceless beauty, rich in love's eternal gold.
> Nixon Waterman.

Even after our repentance we need to pray every day, "Forgive us," and so Esther, as a picture of our Intercessor, comes in fitly for our comfort. Here it is especially appropriate to introduce a story told by Rev. F. G. Brobse, in Make Way for the King:

"At the battle of Cold Harbor, a captain of magnificent physique lay mortally wounded. Six or eight of his men, who almost idolized him, stood bending about him with the traces of tears upon their grimy cheeks. The captain had asked to be buried with the stars and stripes wrapped about him, and then he said: 'My brave boys, we are fighting and bleeding for a cause worthy of our loyalty, even unto death. But Jesus Christ died for an infinitely greater cause, which should command our allegiance, even until death. He died to save you and me and all who put their trust in him, with an everlasting salvation. Boys, cleave to Christ.' His physical strength was gone in this appeal for his King; and his spirit turned from his comrades to his King, as it was about to depart, and he whispered, 'Jesus, Jesus,' and the gaze of those stalwart soldiers was riveted upon his face. They had seen a splendor wreathe his face as, inspired by the loftiest heroism, he had exultingly led them in the charge on the enemy. But they had never seen such radiance as flamed in his face while his soul exulted in the blissful anticipation of meeting his King. And they stood in awe as that radiance lingered, even when the pulse ceased to throb."

The Ascending Christ

But let us not forget that we need not only pardon but power all along our way, the power of the Holy Spirit. The chief of an Indian tribe that had never heard the Gospel, thus responded to its first presentation: "Missionary, I have long lost faith in our old paganism. . . . I made up my mind years ago that this Great Spirit, so kind and so watchful and so loving, did not care for the beating of the conjuror's drum or the shaking of the rattle of the medicine-man. So I for years have had no religion. Missionary, what you have said to-day fills up my heart and satisfies all its longings. It is just what I have been expecting to hear about the Great Spirit." Spiritless religion, God also says, is no better than "sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal."

In our life journey we also need, not only an Advocate, but a daily Protector, such as Ezra and his company had when journeying to Jerusalem with no other guard than God, who protected them, not only against outside robbers, but against themselves, lest they should embezzle the trust funds they carried as stewards of God.

> The little sharp vexations,
> And the briars that catch and fret—
> Why not take all to the Helper
> Who has never failed us yet?
> Then, leaving all our weakness
> With the One divinely strong,
> Forget that we bore the burden,
> And carry away the song. -Phillips Brooks.

In our life journey we need also a refuge in trouble, such as Nehemiah found in prayer. Prayer was the secret of that rare courage he showed as Mayor of Jerusalem. He reports the general sinful customs, adding bravely, "So did not I," which recalls a like case. In one of the great battles of the fifteenth century, the Emperor of Germany saw an entire reigment take to flight, with the exception of one man, who stood his ground, and defended himself gallantly till he fell covered with wounds. The emperor inquired his name. It was Metter. That night, at supper, talking of the regiment in question, he remarked, "They all fled—but Metter nicht." Most persons know that nicht is the German for "not." The family adopted the additional monosyllable, and hence the origin of the house of Metternich.

The fearlessness of Nehemiah, and of Ezra, and of Daniel, is illustrated in the following story: Elliot, the Apostle of the American Indians, when in the wilderness without the company of any white man, was at various times treated in a threatening manner by some of the Indians. Yet his Almighty Protector inspired him with such resolution that he said, "I am about the work of the great God, and my God is with me so that I fear neither you nor all the chiefs in the country. I will go on, and do you touch me if you dare."

And they will make the best progress in life's journey who by abstinence build a wall of favorable environment about them for a defence against the soul's worst foes.

"It is not enough to carry a compass," says Ivan Panin; "we must also keep the magnet away." That is simply a figurative paraphrase of the petition in our Lord's Prayer which we so often repeat—thoughtlessly, perhaps—"Lead us not into temptation." Our Lord realized that it was not enough to recognize the evil or even the dangerous character of temptation. We must keep away from it—or keep it away from us.

And what could we do in life's perplexing journey if we did not have the same Guide Book that was read by Ezra to the people, who changed their wicked courses when found contrary to the Law of God.

A gentleman saw two children before him in the cars, a boy and a girl. Both looked tired. They were dressed poorly but neatly, and were traveling alone. Toward noon the little girl got up from her seat. Presently he found her kneeling on the floor, with her head bowed in the cushion. Was she sick? Did she find this an easy way to sleep? No, she was praying. "What are you doing, my little girl?" he asked, when she got up. "I was saying, 'Our Father who art in heaven,'" she said. "And what are you saying it for, now?" he asked again. "I'm so hungry," she said. "We've been traveling two days," said the boy, "and our luncheon is all gone." The gentleman wished he had something in his pocket, but it was empty. At the next stopping place he went out himself and bought something for the children to eat. When he handed it to the child, "I knew it would come," she said, looking up with a blush of joy upon her face. "Did God send you, sir?"

Let us go nowhere God does not send us, and let us never fail to go where he does send us. "That's what I'm here for," said the pleasant-faced conductor, as he took the infirm old lady in his arms and lifted her down from the open electric car as gently and reverently as if he had been her own son. What wonder there were tears in the old lady's eyes, as the car whirled away with its load of impatient passengers. She had been nervously dreading for blocks that ordeal of dismounting from the car. But at her first move, with a quick glance at her troubled face and feeble body, the young conductor had divined her need of him, and sprung to her assistance, with the cheery words: "That's what I'm here for, madam." That's why we journey through life with others that we may be of service. No man has read his guide book aright that does not go beyond duty into the joys of privilege.

THE CHARIOTS OF THE LORD

A Story of the days of Religious Persecution in England

BY JOSEPH HOCKING

CHAPTER II.—Continued

"WHEN would you see him, your Majesty?" asked Jeffreys.

"Even here, and now."

"Your slightest wish must be obeyed," said Jeffreys, and he forthwith gave orders for Trelawney to be brought.

"And now there is another matter, my Lord Jeffreys," said the King, "and for this reason I sent for you. I knew not that you had a daughter."

"I did not consider the matter of sufficient importance to tell your Majesty."

"I would see her," said the King. "And if she pleaseth me, I will see to it that she is well wedded."

"She is but a chit of a girl, your Majesty, and but poorly favored."

"I must be the judge of that. But thou wilt be able to dower her liberally."

"I am but a poor man," said Jeffreys, "I depend solely upon your Majesty's favor."

"And I, as you know, depend much upon our brother Louis' generosity."

"Your Majesty's reign is young yet. Give me but a little while, your Majesty, and I will not only punish your naughty subjects, but I will make you independent of the favor of France."

"How?" asked the King eagerly.

"There be many traitors in England," said Jeffreys, "many rich Presbyterians. What is to hinder the estates of these traitors reverting to the Crown?"

The King answered not a word, but a pleased look came into his eyes.

England," said Jeffreys; "e'en yet there be those who say I murdered my brother, and that I have proclaimed a falsehood concerning his reception into the Holy Catholic Church at his death. I tell you there is much work for you, my Lord Jeffreys."

"Ay, and it shall be done to your Majesty's satisfaction," said Jeffreys eagerly.

After this the King asked Jeffreys other questions concerning Jeffreys' daughter, which, to the King's annoyance, his Chief Justice answered somewhat evasively.

Presently a lackey entered.

"The prisoner whom you sent for awaits your pleasure," he said. A few minutes later, young Benedict Trelawney stood before the King.

His sword had been taken away from him, but otherwise no change had been made in his attire or accoutrements. Evidently he had not been ill-treated in prison, for there was no sign of dishevelment on his person. His face was free from all sign of fear, except that he looked somewhat pale. His eyes were bold and steady, his lips showed no tremor.

When he saw the King he knelt reverently, and having risen, he stepped back as if to await his Majesty's pleasure.

"What is this I hear about thee?" asked the King sourly.

"I know not, sire," said the youth. "But doubtless if this man hath spoken of me, he hath spoken ill indeed."

"Why?" asked the King, astonished at his boldness.

"Because I dared to tell him the truth, your Majesty."

At this Jeffreys' eyes became as those of a maniac. His cheeks were purple with rage.

"Your Majesty," he cried. "You see——"

"Silence," said the King sharply. "Thy name, young man?"

"Benedict Trelawney, sire."

"From whence did you come?"

"The Trelawneys are, as your Majesty knows, a Cornish family. My father was the younger brother of my Lord Bishop of Bristol, and fought for your father during the Rebellion."

"When he saw the King he knelt reverently . . . . "

"And thy mother, who is she?"

"My mother is dead, your Majesty."

"Ay, but who was she?"

"She was a cousin of Richard Baxter, who was unlawfully sent to King's Bench Prison to-day," said the youth boldly.

"Ah!" snorted Jeffreys. "Now we begin to see, your Majesty. No wonder he is a traitor. He hath the blood of that canting Presbyterian in his veins. A Trelawney and a Baxter. It is a bad mixture. What must such a man be?"

"One who scorns such as you," said the youth.

"Silence!" said the King. "What, wilt thou be insolent in our very presence?"

"Pardon me, sire; but I have been in London a month, and I have on many occasions seen, and on more occasions heard of this man's devilry."

The King seemed more astonished than angry, while Jeffreys' rage was so great that he could not speak.

"Why did you come to London?" asked James.

"To seek my fortune," said the youth. "My father was but a younger brother, and thus his patrimony was small. My mother brought him but little dowry. My father died less than a year ago, leaving Trelawney House and a small estate behind to my brother and me. But it was not enough for both, so I took only my share of the money and left him with the lands. Your Majesty had just ascended the throne, and I determined to come hither."

"And what hast thou done this last month?"

"I have gone around London, your Majesty."

Evidently the youth knew nothing of court etiquette. He spoke to the King boldly and frankly, and both in his speech and presence there was the suggestion of the free, wild life, the rugged scenery, and the pure air of his native county. He treated the King respectfully, even reverently; but no touch of servility or of flattery was evident. Moreover, the fires which ran in the blood of the ancient race to which he belonged gave him a sense of assurance and pride. He had come of a race which scorned lies and cruelty. Fighting and daring deeds they had always loved, but they had always seen to it that swift vengeance descended on the unjust and the cruel.

Even the King felt this, and he looked at him for some moments with a certain degree of admiration before he spoke again.

CHAPTER III.

"AND you came to London to seek your fortune?"

"Yes, sire."

"You know this man Baxter?"

"I never saw him until to-day, sire."

"And yet he is related to you."

"He was, so I have been told, sent to prison from Westminster Hall, and kept there until his trial to-day. I tried to see him but could not."

"Did you call on your uncle at Bristol on thy way thither?"

"Yes, sire."

"And what did he tell you?"

"To serve the King, and uphold the Protestant faith, sire."

"Did he give you no letter recommending you to our presence?"

"He did, sire. And truly I have tried three times to obtain audience with your Majesty, but at every time I was told that your Majesty was too much occupied."

"I remember," said the King, "and it is well I did not trouble to see one who is evidently a brawler, a disturber of my courts, and a traitor."

"A traitor, sire!"

"Ay, a traitor. How can a man be other than a traitor, when he dares to question what my Chief Justice hath done, ay, and when he opposes him in open court?"

"He called me a liar, your Majesty," cried Jeffreys.

"But your Majesty, is not a man who tells lies a liar?" cried the youth ingenuously. "He said there was not an honest man in England but who looked on Richard Baxter as a knave. And yet, sire, even while I have been in London, I have heard him spoken of by many honest people as a man of God. Why, my uncle, the Bishop of Bristol, told me that while he did not believe in many of Master Baxter's doctrines, he still regarded him as a man who was faithful and God-fearing."

The bold simplicity of the youth again appealed to James II. He was angry because of his plain speech, and yet the frank, truthful way in which he spoke presented such a contrast to the speech of his courtiers that, in spite of himself, he grew more and more interested. Sullen, and often brutal as James was, he was not uninfluenced by the young man's transparency. Therefore he adopted a tone which would otherwise have been impossible. The absolute fearlessness of Benedict Trelawney made him speak almost kindly. Nay, more, he even contemplated taking him into his service.

The loyalty of such a youth, he thought, must be worth having.

"But know you not that it is disrespectful to your sovereign to show disrespect to his Chief Justice?" said James. "My Lord Jeffreys represented the Crown, therefore when you insulted him, you insulted your King also."

"Truly I never thought of such a thing," said the youth. "Moreover, I am sure your Majesty cannot know

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

The Christmas Festival

NO holiday in the calendar possesses so many and such varied customs as the 25th of December. Many are the traditions concerning the celebration of the Christmas holiday, and curious and interesting are the varied ways of observing it in different countries.

While to the Christian the day possesses a sacredness that is given to no other, as commemorating the birth of the Saviour, it was not always upon this date that the Nativity was celebrated. The early Christians observed the festival at one time in September, and at another period in April. When Rome adopted the new faith, the great pagan festival of the Saturnalia, which the Romans celebrated on Dec. 17, 18, and 19, and which, under the Empire, lasted seven days, was discontinued, and the Christmas festival celebrated by the people instead. As Christianity spread, the day became one of universal celebration and good cheer. Among Northern barbarian tribes the great festival of Thor, called Yule, was transformed into Christmas, with very little change beside the name.

At present, while all Christian people welcome each recurring 25th of December as the birthday of our Lord, each country has its own peculiar manner of celebrating. In our own lands, a feature of the celebration is the pretty Santa Claus myth, borrowed from the German. This snowy-haired, red-cheeked benefactor of children grew up in in the realm of German fairy-tale and folk-lore.

There are many traditions as to the origin of the Christmas tree, among which there is none more charming than that told of the loving Gertrude, wife of Henry of Wartenstein. Henry had returned home after a two years' absence with the crusaders in the Holy Land. Eastern sun had warmed him, and Oriental customs seemed to have somewhat changed his German character. With a woman's intuition, the good wife saw that her husband was unhappy. She heard him describing to some friends the beauties of the southern country, the charm of Italy's blue skies, clear air, and celestial flowers and fruit. He told of a Christmas Eve he spent in the South, where, in the church, lit with thousands of candles, the picture of Christ looked out from a wreath of roses and branches of laurel.

How to make the coming Christmas partake of some of these beauties, now became the constant thought of the devoted wife. One day, in walking through the wood, as she observsd the evergreen trees with their heads rearing toward heaven, an inspiration came to her, and she exclaimed, "O fir tree! You shall win back my husband's love for his fatherland and his home. You shall adorn our church at the next Christmas! I will load you with nuts and apples, and hundreds of lights shall make you still more beautiful." Nuts were gathered with snow roses, that Henry might remember that fresh flowers could also be had in Germany for Christmas. The good pastor told Gertrude that it was right to glorify the feast of the Lord's birth, as she intended, and said: "To reclaim a soul to his home and his land is the work of God, and may the evergreen of the fir-tree be a symbol of God's unchangeable love." This first Christmas tree accomplished all that Gertrude had hoped. Ever after, there stood a tree in the church on Christmas Day. The people came from all the country round to see this wonderful tree, and the example was followed throughout Germany, and now in almost every land the German Christmas tree brings thoughts of peace and love and charity to the whole human family.

At no time of the year can generous gifts be more acceptable to the poor, than at this season. Many an almost discouraged mother has reason to rejoice as she receives a well-filled basket from kind-hearted friends, who have sought her out in her poor home. Many a grateful prayer ascends for blessings on those who, in their own joyful celebration, forget not the widow and the fatherless. To the rich, it may be a "Merry Christmas"; but to those who are cold and hungry, it can be made a day when hearts, as well as bodies, are warmed; a day when the gnawings of hunger are quieted; a happy Christmas Day, the memory of which will go far toward shortening the long, cold winter. At the foot of the polished stair.

Indian Givers

THE children have a rhyme about those givers who, after awhile, regret their generosity, and take back their gifts. Such people are called Indian givers.

An amusing story, in one of the magazines lately, described the consternation of a good woman, who, for several years, had devoted herself to mahing presents for her friends. Year by year her busy needles flashed to and fro, and the soft wool was transformed into lovely fleecy shawls, which she sent to friends. All the time she wished she could bring herself to make at least one shawl for herself, but she never felt that she could spare the time or money for this. There came a Christmas when no less than six pink shawls came to her as gifts. The people to whom she had sent them had utilized them as Christmas presents, and in turn the people who received them had done the same, and one by one the shawls, which had never been used, got back to their original donor. She was not the Indian giver in the line, but what can be said of the spirit which leads people thus to treat the gifts of friends? A gift, no matter how small, should be sacred in the eyes of the recipient. There seems something extremely mean in presenting to some one else an article which has been especially made for you. The plea is made that presents are sometimes misfits; that one receives something which she has already, and that by passing it on, she can give pleasure elsewhere. But it would seem more in keeping with the true spirit of Christmas giving if each person should keep and cherish what is sent to her; not passing it along from hand to hand, and hurting the feelings of the original sender.

Holiday Shoppers

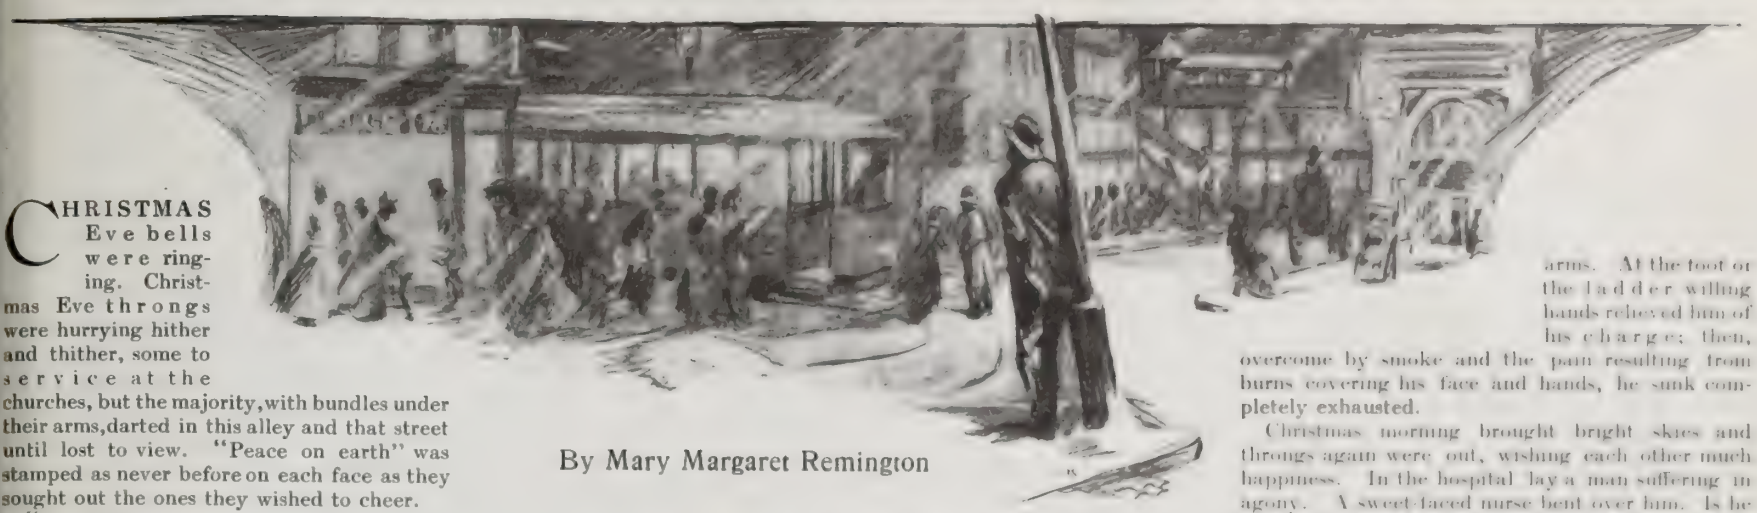
In the great pressure upon the stores at the holiday times, much relief is given by customers who themselves carry home as many of their parcels as they can; all small parcels especially should be taken by the persons purchasing them. The burdens upon delivery wagons, express carriers, and all sorts of people, including the United States mail, are so heavy at this season, that a little consideration all round puts into practice the essence of the Golden Rule.

A Swedish Christmas Poem

A reader of this page has sent us a lovely little poem about a legend current in Sweden on the Nativity. It will surely please all who have never seen it before.

They tell a lovely story in the lands beyond the sea,
How, when the King of Glory lay on his mother's knee,
Before the prophet-princes came, bringing gifts in hand,
The dumb beasts felt the miracle, men could not understand!
The gentle, patient donkey, and the ox that tread the corn,
Knelt down beside the manger, and knew that Christ was born.
And so they say in Sweden, at twelve each Christmas night:
The dumb beasts kneel to worship and see the Christmas light!
This fancy makes men kinder to creatures needing care:
They give them Christmas greeting and dainty Christmas fare;
The cat and dog sup gaily, and a sheaf of golden corn
Is raised above the roof-tree for the birds on Christmas morn!
We do not live in Sweden, but we can feed the birds,
And make dumb creatures happy, by kindly deeds and words.
No animal so humble, no creeping worm so small,
But that the God who made us, has made and loves them all!
If we to them are cruel, like Christ we cannot be!
And this shall be our lesson from our dear Christmas tree!

HIS BEST CHRISTMAS



By Mary Margaret Remington

CHRISTMAS Eve bells were ringing. Christmas Eve throngs were hurrying hither and thither, some to service at the churches, but the majority, with bundles under their arms, darted in this alley and that street until lost to view. "Peace on earth" was stamped as never before on each face as they sought out the ones they wished to cheer.

"Hey, Bill, got any chick?"

The one answering to the name of Bill turned slowly around, his beady eyes finally fastening themselves on his questioner. "Naw, pal, not a red. Slept last night in the park and had a bite fer doin' an errand fer a poor feller like mysel, only he had luck last night, fer he pulled a man fer all he was worth, and he got the illigant sum of ten dollars; now he'll be livin' in clover fer a month, when he'll make another pull, unless the cops get onter him and send him to the Island."

"Wall, Bill, you and I are not good fer very much if we don't strike some luck to-night. Look at the crowds coming along. This is what they call Christmas Eve, and we want to celebrate it with a little of the good things of life. Good-night, Bill. Wish ye luck until we see each other agin'. Merry Christmas to ye! That's what they say."

Down the avenue stalked a rough-looking figure; finally the figure stood gazing at the crowd. "I wonder what's that makes everyone look so happy to-night," soliloquized the owner of the figure. "They all look as if they never knew a bit of trouble. There comes an old man, he kind of stumbles along; wonder if he wouldn't like help over the crossing? Guess it'll do no harm to ask. 'Give ye a hand, mister; a powerful lot of vehicles passing. Yes?' By thunder! got him over, and he turned to me and said, 'Take this, my man, you may find it will do you good.' A purse of money, with a V in it. A good starter. I kinder thought of my old father when I saw him comin' along. I wonder what that gal has done up in that bundle? She is smiling to herself. She's dropped her bundle! I kind of feel sorry for her; she looks a little like my own little gal I had once. 'Here, miss, you've lost yer bundle?'"

"Oh, thank you!" With a smile she passes on.

"What a sweet look that was! She looked like an angel. I wonder if my little gal would have looked the same, and I wonder if she is living. Me and her used to love each other dearly. Well, my work stopped; then I got ter going out late o' nights and drinking; then I stayed away from home altogether, when my little one silently disappeared. Some said she had gone away out of the city, and others told me she had been taken very ill and she had died—gone to her mother. Oh, that was a long time ago. She and I used ter have good times hanging up our stockings the night before Christmas. I would listen to hear her crow and laugh, and then rush to me and throw her arms around my neck when she found all she wanted in her stocking. Then she would say, 'Pop, get up now, and see what Santa has for you.' I would take her on my shoulder, and she could hardly wait until I pulled everything clear out of the toe of my stocking. Then we would put everything on the breakfast table, and she would look so happy and then say, 'Pop, I've had the nicest Christmas I've ever had.' But those times are past. She wouldn't know me if she would pass now."

The hour of midnight had passed. The Christmas Eve throngs had all passed homewards. The shops had long since closed, and quiet reigned in this busy quarter of the big city.

"Guess I'll find Bill now and see what luck he's had. My luck has been pretty good, but I will have to keep a stiff upper lip to Bill. I had this V given me; and an old woman gave me this, and Bill will never know of the smile that ere girl gave me. Hello! What's that? A fire, as yer live! Guess I'll go!"

Loud shrieked the whistle of the engine. Clang, clang, clang, rang the life-saver's bell as the cart flew down the avenue. A few belated people followed and stopped before a sea of flame at a high building. All was wild excitement. The firemen worked like heroes to save property and lives, stopping at intervals to take breath, to again rush into the fiery furnace, to emerge again with a scantily clothed girl or woman in their arms. It was the "Home for Cripples." One after another was brought out and taken to homes adjoining. A call for more help! A wing of the building before untouched was ablaze! In it were the most helpless of the inmates.

"Hey, there, if yer want more help, I'll give yer a lift!" Away rushed the firemen and their new helper. Into the fiery vortex they rushed. One after another was safely brought out and cared for. Half an hour had been spent in this manner, when down the ladder, stumbling with the weight in his arms, came Joseph Murphy. His limbs trembled. His head was thrown back as if in agony. His clasp grew tighter about the woman in his arms. At the foot of the ladder willing hands relieved him of his charge; then, overcome by smoke and the pain resulting from burns covering his face and hands, he sank completely exhausted.

Christmas morning brought bright skies and throngs again were out, wishing each other much happiness. In the hospital lay a man suffering in agony. A sweet-faced nurse bent over him. Is he dreaming, or is his mind unbalanced by his suffering? He reaches out his poor burned hands to the nurse.

"Ye look powerful like my own little gal! Yes, jest like yer mother! Sallie was my little gal's name, and her and I used to have good times on Christmas."

The nurse's face grew pale. "My name is Sallie, but my father has been dead for years. They told me so."

"Aye, it may be, but my Sallie's voice was like music to me, and my Sallie's eyes were blue as the heavens! My Sallie used to say, 'When I am big I will keep house for you, Pop.' Do you remember? Oh, you do! I know I have found my Sallie! No one else could have a voice so much like hers! No one's eyes could be like hers! And, do ye remember when ye were eight years old, on your birthday I gave a picture of yer mother to ye! It was set in a little gold frame. It was taken when we were married. Do ye remember that?"

From the folds of her uniform the nurse took a tiny frame of gold and held it before her patient.

"Your mother! My Sallie's mother! That takes me back to the time we was happy! Your mother and I, and ye on my knee! And here am I, a disgrace to your name! I have suffered more than these burns!"

"Hush, you must be quiet or you will not get well!" The nurse's tones were firm and quiet. A cool hand was placed on his head. The doctor came in to dress his wounds shortly after, and was surprised at the look of animation on the sick man's face.

"I want ter get well, doctor. I want ter live fer my little gal, and I'll show her I can still be a man."

The following day's paper told of the terrible fire at the "Home for Cripples," and it also told in large red letters about a poor, besotted looking man carrying out women and children until he was taken to a hospital on account of terrible burns and being overcome by smoke. How a hero existed under the tramp's guise. It also said it was very doubtful if he recovered.

But Joseph Murphy did recover. One day in early spring he was taken to pretty rooms near by. There a ministering angel in the garb of a nurse comes daily to visit and cheer him up. He looked for those visits as if his little girl had never left him, and as if the time spent with his "pals" was a thing belonging to another's life. Love sheds about him its elevating influences, and each Christmas Day brings only memories of the past.

Sang a Hymn While Dying

A WESTERN paper publishes the following touching story:

Clara Butler, soprano of Morgan Park Baptist Church, Chicago, was thrown by an accident under the wheels of a train and was hurried to the hospital in the hope of saving her life by an operation.

Miss Butler knew that death was at hand. She whispered a message for her relatives, who were in an adjoining room, and said with a smile, "Tell them I am not afraid to die."

Then her glorious voice, a voice that had often raised the souls of devout worshipers above the things of time and sense, floated through the operating rooms. Surgeons and nurses turned away to the windows as the dying girl sang over and over again the one stanza of her favorite song. Their eyes were wet. The girl's soul was in her voice that now faltered and died away in a whisper as the dark waters closed about her. "Abide with me."

Death soon came to relieve her sufferings, but all who heard her sing and who saw her felt that they had witnessed the triumphant close of a beautiful Christian life.

An Outdoor Sunday School

The following letter from Darrah, Calif., will interest many readers:

"The Presbyterians, who till lately held church twice a month at Chowchilla Schoolhouse, about three miles from here, where they had very poor attendance, moved to this place last spring, to reach a larger population. A Sunday School was founded and continued successfully. I send a picture of the Sunday School, thinking some of you will be pleased to see it, and partly because we were glad of the success. The superintendent was Rev. C. K. Westfall, of Darrah."

The photograph is unique, in these days of well-equipped Sunday Schools, and has a strong flavor of pioneer days.

Died a Martyr in China

THE whole Christian world has been shocked by the account of the massacre of five American missionaries at Lien Chow, Oct. 28, 1905. One of the victims I personally knew and loved. Dr. Eleanor Chestnut was of English-Irish descent, and was born in one of the Western States. Very early in life, bereft of both parents, she was educated by the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, to become a medical missionary. Dr. Chestnut was a brilliant student, a fine linguist, graduating from a Nurses' Training School, and afterwards from a Medical College in Chicago, Ill. She then came East for a year's work in a hospital, and in 1894, when in her twenty-fifth year, went to China, where she did excellent work. Dr. Chestnut was a delicate woman, and was considered by her friends almost too frail to undertake the life of hardship she subsequently endured. She was, however, brave and courageous, and was determined to go, even if she died there. She was a most winning, lovable woman, and her generosity and self-denial endeared her to all with whom she came in contact. She seemed always to be doing something for others. Her letters from China were full of sympathy for the poor blind people who came to her dispensary. She was especially interested in girls, and, forgetful of her own needs, spent much of her salary helping to educate them to become nurses.

"Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from thenceforth: yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them."

The Chariots of the Lord

what is done in your name. Let me tell you what I have seen, sire. The first night I came to London I chanced to go into a tavern. There I saw this man Jeffreys, drinking in company with a number of low buffoons. He joined them in lewd, coarse song, such as no man of honor would pollute his lips with. I heard language pass his lips, which, had I heard from the lackeys in my home, I would have horsewhipped them soundly. I saw him encouraging his companions to use still baser language, and still more ribald jests."

"It is lies, your Majesty!" roared Jeffreys, beside himself with rage. "Can't you see the lies coming from his black heart."

"Silence!" said the King. He seemed to be enjoying the recital of the youth, even although an angry frown was on his forehead, and a cruel look in his lack-lustre eyes.

"What I have told you is the truth," cried young Benedict Trelawney. "I knew you could not know of such things, or you would never permit them. Then, when I was told that he was your Majesty's Chief Justice, I left the tavern in very shame, for truly I had thought him to be some pothouse loafer of low repute. The next day, your Majesty, I went into one of your law courts, and there I saw this man mete out punishment to one far less worthy of punishment than he. The prisoner was a woman, your Majesty, and her fault had been slight; yet did he condemn her to be whipped at the cart-tail. 'Hangman,' he said, 'I charge you to pay particular attention to this lady! Scourge her soundly, man! Scourge her till the blood runs down! It is frosty weather, therefore a cold time for madam to strip in. See that you warm her shoulders thoroughly.' I heard and saw this with my own ears and eyes, sire, and yet he is your Majesty's Chief Justice."

At this the frown deepened on the King's face. He looked alternately at the purple face of the judge, and then at the earnest features of the youth, and as he looked his anger increased. He thought he saw in Benedict Trelawney's face evidences of the same treason which marked the words of the outspoken Bishop of Bristol, and a feeling of dislike, in spite of his admiration for his frank bearing, came into his head.

"And what then?" said James.

"What then?" said the youth fearlessly. "Then, as you are a Christian king, loving only the truth and the good, and hating the cruel and the base, I doubt not you will send this fellow to the same prison as he has to-day sent a better man."

Again, in spite of the youth's unwise words, he had a feeling of admiration for him.

"Did you think that by gaining an audience with me you would also find a road to fortune?" said the King presently.

"I trusted so, your Majesty."

"And what can you do?"

"I can be a faithful servant, sire. I know how to ride a horse, I can handle a sword, I know how to obey my master, and I am not a fool."

"And who do you wish for a master?"

"There can only be one master for a descendant of the Trelawneys, sire."

"And who is that?"

"The King, sire."

"Ah!"

Again James' anger died away, and he became more and more pleased with him.

"You would fight for your King then?"

"My family hath always done so, sire."

"Have you heard aught of the coming of Monmouth?"

"There are rumors afloat, sire, but they may be of no import."

"But if Monmouth came, you would fight for your King?"

"How could I do other?" said the youth, as if surprised that such a question should be asked.

"But if he comes as the supporter of the Protestant faith?"

"That would count for naught, sire."

"Why," said James eagerly, "are you not a Protestant?"

"Ay, that I am," said Trelawney quickly, "and saving your Majesty's presence I do not see how an Englishman can be aught else; but Monmouth coming as a Protestant would mean naught to me."

"Why, do you doubt his word?"

"I do not doubt yours, sire. You have declared that you will reign as a Protestant King, according to the laws of the land, and the word of a king must never be doubted."

Again a sour look passed over the King's face.

"And would you fight against your King if he sought to bring true religion into the country?"

"What do you mean by true religion, sire?"

"The only religion," said the King angrily.

"You mean, doubtless, the religion of our Lord Jesus Christ," said the youth.

"Yes, and represented on earth by his Vicegerent, his Holiness the Pope of Rome."

"You ask me, sire, if I would fight for the king who sought to bring back popery?" said the youth.

"Yes," said James. He did not like the bald way his thoughts had been put into words, but he did not seek to restate them. Besides, he was anxious to see what was in the youth's mind.

"I should no longer owe him any allegiance," said Benedict Trelawney.

"Not owe your King allegiance?"

"No, for he would cease to be King. He would have broken his sacred word, and when a king breaks his word he ceases to be King."

The King's eyes became bloodshot with anger. He arose to his feet as though he would have struck the youth with his own hand.

"Back to prison with him," he snarled.

"Yes, your Majesty," said Jeffreys with a cruel gleam in his eyes. "Has your Majesty any wish as to how he should be treated?"

"Treat him as you will," said James. "Have his treason flogged out of him, my lord Jeffreys."

"Yes, yes; your Majesty shall be obeyed," cried the Chief Justice delightedly. "Officers, guard him safely to prison. I will attend to him to-morrow."

Benedict Trelawney looked around in wonder. Why the change in the King's attitude? He had spoken only the words of a loyal Englishman, according to the code of honor which had ever been the watchword of the Trelawney family. Then a change came into his eyes. He saw the angry scowl on the King's unlovely face, he marked the sinister gleam in the eyes of Jeffreys; and it came to him that they were treating him unjustly.

The Bowery Mission Bible Class

Many More Interesting Questions sent to Dr. O'Hanlon's Question Box and Ably Answered

EVERY Sunday increases the astonishing popularity of Dr. O'Hanlon's "Question Box" at the Bowery Mission. Last Sunday's attendance was the largest thus far, and the number of questions sent up to the Doctor to be answered from the platform was greater than ever. These interrogations take a very wide range and deal with many phases of spiritual experience. Following are a few of the many questions answered last Sunday, together with Dr. O'Hanlon's replies:

23 Isn't it just as possible for a man to control his belief, as, for example, to control his love?

No. Our beliefs are based upon satisfactory evidence intellectually; our love or affections originate in the heart and not in the intellect, not by reasoning, but spontaneously as a mother's love, a patriot's love, or conjugal love. It is true that a man cannot believe a thing merely because he wants to believe it; but it is also true that a man cannot believe a thing if he does not want to believe it, "for a man convinced against his will is of the same opinion still."

24 If a man has a burden on his heart, relating to his family and family affairs, should he unburden himself in his public testimony, or should he speak to his pastor in private, or should he rely on his own prayers?

Not in public, but in the prayerful reading of the Word of God; in much private prayer, and in the counsel of your own pastor, and of other good and wise men of God.

25 Will you please inform me if, when a man is converted, it is absolutely necessary to make an open and public confession of faith? If a person is soundly converted and does not make a public profession, does it in any way detract from the grace he receives from God?

Yes, absolutely necessary—Matthew 10: 32, 33; Mark 8: 38; Luke 12: 8, 9; Romans 10: 9, 10; II Timothy 2: 12; I John 1: 9.

26 Does Dr. Hanlon believe that a man, as soon as he dies in sin, suffers in the physical sense of the word; that is, in the meaning of the word as we now use it?

No. After death no physical suffering. The body will be raised a spiritual body, and suffer as such in the case of the lost (John 5: 28, 29), only, however, after the resurrection.

27 A man dies in sin and is damned. He died the enemy of his Creator. 1. Does God forgive his enemies? 2. Would Dr. Hanlon condemn a man to eternal torment, even if he could?

1. No, not after death; for it is a moral impossibility for God to grant forgiveness to the finally impenitent, either in this world or in the world to come. 2. Yes. The good judge imposes the most awful penalty on the individual, for the sake of the greatest good to the greatest number.

28 In one of the Gospels I find the following colloquy between a human being and his Creator: "Good Master, what can I do that I may have life everlasting?" "Why callest thou me good? there is none good but one, that is, God." Is this an acknowledgment by Jesus that he was not God?

No. Read Matthew 19: 17, in the Greek or in the Revised Version. Then this young man was a Jew—to him Christ was not the Son of God—Christ says to him, "Why callest thou me good, if thou believest that I am falsely claiming to be the Son of God?"

29 I find in the New Testament a text I wish to bring before your notice. God will reward every man according to what? The church he belongs to? No. His belief? No. God will reward every man according to his his works. Is not this perfectly plain?

There will be degrees of reward for the righteous, and degrees of punishment for the wicked, to be determined by the deeds done in the body, as we stand at the bar of the general judgment, at the end of the world. But the question of our admission to heaven depends upon our faith in Christ. Mark 16: 16.

30 Can a man attain a state of absolute perfection, even the perfection of Jesus Christ while yet in this world?

No. By no means. At our best we are imperfect—there can be a large degree of purity in our intentions—and God judges us largely by the great and controlling purpose of our life. "If thine eye be single, thine whole body shall be full of light."

31 Please tell if there is a hell?

See Mark 9: 42-48, inclusive; also Matthew 25: 46.

32 Do you see any sin in smoking, or drinking a glass of wine or beer to meals?

The cost in money of these habits, the danger of harm to ourselves, and of our example to our fellows, ought to induce us to give up the two habits.

33 You said last Sunday that belief depends on evidence. Emerson and a host of other great thinkers could find no evidence of the divinity of Christ. Is this appreciation of evidence which Christians have, a divine gift? If so, then what becomes of those who are not so gifted?

By far the great majority of the greatest thinkers in all Christian lands, in all the generations for the past 1,900 years, have believed in the divinity of Christ. Why not accept the greater and the stronger testimony where so much is at stake?

34 If a man has continually lived a criminal life, must he make restitution to those whom he has wronged by theft, before he can make himself right with God?

Yes, must make amends, and restitution if possible. Matthew 5: 23, 24.

35 Is it possible for a man to sin away his "day of grace," except by blasphemy against the Holy Ghost?

No. Till the very last hour of life mercy is offered to the sinner; but the unyielding heart grows harder and harder, till at last, the probabilities in the case of the inveterate sinner are as a thousand to one that he will not come to the Saviour. "If the light that is in thee becomes darkness, how great is that darkness!"

36 If a man dies an unbeliever and goes to hell, whilst his wife being a Christian goes to heaven, will she be able to behold her husband in perdition and remain unmoved?

In heaven the marriage relation is totally dissolved, Luke 20: 27-36, inclusive. The lost in hell have some knowledge of heaven (Luke 16: 23), but the righteous in heaven probably have no knowledge whatever of hell—certainly none that can disturb their peace in that peaceful abode.

37 What is your opinion of the Blessed Eucharist as practised by the Catholic Church?

The Catholic Church as to the sacrament of the Lord's supper, takes the words of Christ in their literal meaning, i. e., that the bread and the wine are really the body and the blood of Christ; the Protestants believe that the bread and the wine are but the strong symbols of his broken body and his shed blood.

38 Does Dr. Hanlon believe in Spiritualism?

Not that there is anything whatever of the supernatural in it, or in any of its manifestations.

39 I find in the Testament, "Depart from me ye cursed into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels." If Jesus of Nazareth was figurative in this why not in other instances? In the case of his divinity, for example.

Jesus claimed, time and again, in most explicit and positive terms, that he was the Son of God. Figurative language is always capable of being interpreted in two different meanings; but the language of Our Lord on this subject is so explicit that only the one meaning can be given to it.

Christians is reckoned by hundreds of millions, that there should be many "liberals" among them; but they are few in comparison with the multitudes of faithful believers who accept the teachings of Christ as trustworthy and ultimate. I am confident that the great heart of the Universal Church beats true to the Bible, and true to Christ crucified. If the pendulum ever swung the other way, it is swinging back.

DAVID JAMES BURRELL.

Emotionalism Giving Way to Reverent and Enlightened Interpretation

REV. TEUNIS S. HAMLIN (PRESBYTERIAN), WASHINGTON, D. C.

Certain established results of Biblical scholarship, and the potent influence of science and the scientific method, have undoubtedly modified Christian thinking in the direction generally spoken of as "liberal." For example, literal or verbal inspiration of the Holy Scriptures is now mostly abandoned as untenable. At the same time historic and critical study has immensely reinforced their authority, as well as made them more acceptable to an intelligent and reasonable faith. As a corollary, appeals to the emotions are less effective, and hence less common. The sensuous and even gross conception of the death of Jesus the Christ, which until recently prevailed, is evidently passing; and proportionately more emphasis is now laid upon his life. This is plainly more in accord with his own proportion of truth, as seen in his recorded teachings. That in a true and vital sense he died for men, is fully and influentially held, and is everywhere taught; though scientific definition of the atonement is less insisted upon than formerly. If by "The Old Time Religion," is meant emotionalism, it exists chiefly in such organizations as the Salvation Army, where it accomplishes much good, though suited only to primitive and transitional conditions. Reverence is deepening; the golden rule is ever more potent as the guide of life; and men are more eagerly turning to Jesus, as Saviour and Master, in trust and love and loyalty. This always has been, is, and ever will be vital Christianity.

TEUNIS S. HAMLIN.

The Efficacy of the Cross Broadening

REV. S. P. CADMAN (CONGREGATIONAL), BROOKLYN

I do not think that any particular form of theological belief, old or new, has a monopoly of the Cross of Christ. That central fact is the glory of all Christianity, rightly understood and adequately interpreted; and many phases of the so-called liberal beliefs have given it new emphasis and wider rein. For example, men no longer teach to-day that the vast majority of the human race perish in eternal flames. They believe that the redemptive efficacy of Christ is far more operative than was formerly supposed, and they believe well.

S. PARKES CADMAN.

Dissatisfaction with Liberalism Increasing

REV. L. W. MUNHALL, PHILA., PA.

The tendency in religion in this country has been to depend very much on organization and things unspiritual; all of which has made it favorable to new methods and so-called "liberal beliefs." But these methods have produced such meagre results that are desirable, and the "liberal beliefs" are so paralyzing to the spiritual life and work of the church, that there is very great dissatisfaction on every hand, and the pendulum is most certainly swinging back to the "Old Time Religion" and the Cross of Calvary.

L. W. MUNHALL, D.D.

The Pendulum Swing is Back to the Cross

REV. C. D. CASE (BAPT.), BROOKLYN, N. Y.

If there is "a pendulum-swing" at all, it is to the emphasis of the "Old Time Religion;" but I should prefer to say that there is a quiet acceptance of new methods of historical investigation, together with the discarding of the so-called "liberal beliefs." Ministers are learning more than ever that in preaching on questions of historical criticism they are not preaching the Gospel, and learning, too, that the Gospel is the only means of saving the world from the power and penalty of sin. The preaching of the Gospel means the presentation of Jesus as the Son of God and the Saviour of mankind by his death on the Cross, and of the Bible as the one book that is "able to make us wise unto salvation," showing its inspiration by being "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness." C. D. CASE.

Tired of the "Husks" of Liberalism

REV. F. M. BRISTOL (M. E.), WASHINGTON, D. C.

Everybody is becoming tired and sick of the husks of the so-called "liberal beliefs." The people will not receive the speculative uncertainties of rationalism, and the preachers are learning that fact. Hence the people are demanding and the preachers are supplying the substantiated truths of the faith once delivered to the saints. Nothing can supplant the Cross. No substitute will be accepted for the "blood of the everlasting covenant." Yes, the pendulum is swinging back with mighty force, to the old-time, the eternal religion. F. M. BRISTOL.

The Old Gospel Never so Popular as Now

REV. R. S. MACARTHUR (BAPT.), N.Y.

For the last five years I have been lecturing before Chautauqua Assemblies in many States. I am fully satisfied that there is now a thoroughly awakened national and municipal conscience regarding civic honesty and political duty, as has not been the case in many years. There is a strong desire to apply the principles of our holy religion to the relations between labor and capital, and to all the relations which men sustain to one another in business and in political life. Notwithstanding certain elements of error in the discussions of Socialism, those discussions have had wholesome effects on religious teachers and on churchmen generally.

I am thoroughly satisfied that the old Gospel was never so popular and never so potent as it is to-day. The old phraseology is obsolete, or at least obsolescent. The demand of the hour is for the old Gospel stated in terms of modern life and progressive thought. We ought not now talk so much of saving souls as of saving men. The man who can tenaciously hold the old Gospel, and can lovingly translate it into the new language demanded by the thought of the hour, will have the ears and hearts of the people to a greater degree than it was possible to secure them for the past quarter of a century at least.

R. S. MAC ARTHUR.

A number of other replies have been received:

Rev. Charles Herald (Congregational), Brooklyn, writes: "Never have I seen such a falling away from the Old Time Religion and the Gospel of the Christ on the Cross of Calvary. Young men by the score are being turned out of our seminaries with their brains almost turned with doubts. Most of the Old Testament incidents are to them Jewish traditions. The miraculous birth of our Lord is a myth. His resurrection is a little doubtful, and the blessed Master is simply held up as a pattern. More and more, the preaching of a religion of simple morality is gaining headway and the New Birth is being lost sight of." Rev. S. T. Willis, of the Church (Disciples) of Christ, New York, writes that the present religious tendency is "toward the personal Christ as the only Saviour of men and therefore toward the Cross of Calvary," but it is also favorable to a broader liberality respecting religious opinions as held by different schools of thought. Rev. Charles T. Bayliss (Congregational), Brooklyn, writes: "The Cross of Christ is receiving a new emphasis."

Skilful use of knitting needle and crochet hook will save dollars and make a woman the proud owner of garments and innumerable other articles which cannot be bought at stores. Sweaters, shawls, petticoats, breakfast jackets, afghans, etc., are a necessity during the winter months—besides they are in high fashion now. Nimble fingers can fashion these feminine accessories in a short time.

In planning a garment, it is important to remember that to produce satisfactory results only the best yarns should be used.

The "Fleisher" Yarns combine all the qualities required by the expert knitter or crocheter—evenness, elasticity, loftiness. They are dyed in a full line of beautiful colors, from the deep rich shades used for afghans, to the delicate tints for children's garments.

If you use The "Fleisher" Yarns, you can be sure that the working will be a pleasure and that the garment will stand the test of wash and wear.

A Newspaper Man's Romance

GUMPTION; the Progressions of Newson New, by Nathaniel C. Fowler, Jr., is a book that will repay a thorough reading. The adventures of the redoubtable hero—for of course he is a hero, even if he was born in Barnstable County, Cape Cod, Massachusetts—are many and varied. He seems to have inherited gumption, as well as to have acquired it from the Spartan character of his early surroundings, all of which combined to form a personality so full of that excellent and serviceable quality as to make the possessor equal to any emergency. His father was "the great Cape Cod curer"—a doctor with a forty-mile-all-round practice, who catered most profitably to the fads and whims of as healthy a set of patients as ever swallowed a prescription. His mother—but why lift the curtain and reveal the family secrets? These must be read in the relator's own language, to be rightly appreciated.

Of course our hero went to Boston—every true Cape Codder makes that pilgrimage at some time or other. This was after his school days, and he broke into the press, accepting a post as reporter on the Wanderer. Here the quality of gumption (Anglice, "grit"), began to assert itself. In a year he became a "seasoned newspaper man." But the reader must learn for himself from the book all about the tremendous things that happened thereafter—how Newson New, through his happy combination of gumption and native ability, climbed to the very tip-top of the ladder of success—not without a stumble or two on the way, of course—and how, at last, he owned a prosperous newspaper and married the sweet girl of his youthful choice.

It was a happy characteristic of the hero that he always was able to look on the bright side of things and this helped him over many a difficulty. He was of the type of man who simply "couldn't be beat nohow;" full of the love of fun and frolic, and fond of a shrewd bargain; wielding a lively editorial quill, but quite amenable to "the perfume of sentiment," and withal a great money-maker. His career as a provincial editor was so crowded with stirring incidents as to seem one continuous performance; but it was both profitable and enjoyable.

Mr. Fowler's story is more than merely clever and entertaining; it is a story the truthfulness of which will appeal to many readers, who can recognize, in its quaint and humorous types of character, the same kind of people they have met in out-of-the-way places and in middle-sized and small Western towns. The local social celebrities, the time-serving pastor, the professional philanthropist, the chronic office-seeker, the political corruptionist, the thousand and one moths who flicker around the newspaper candle, hoping to gain lustre from its brightness—all these the author pictures with cleverness and fidelity. Altogether, he has given us a capital story, and the book, which is published by Small, Maynard & Co., Boston, price $1.50, deserves to be widely read.

Books Received

Select Notes: A Commentary on the International Sunday School Lessons for 1906. This is the thirty-second appearance of the most valuable aid the Sunday School teacher has in his work. Dr. Peloubet has collected, as in former years, all the available material from Oriental scholarship, and presents it in a form useful alike to teachers of each grade. No teacher should be without this excellent work. Pp. 374. Price $1.25. Published by W. A. Wild Company, Boston, Mass.

Sidney Smith. By George W. E. Russell. An excellent and discriminating biography of this prince of clerical humorists. Pp. 243. Price 75c. Published by the Macmillan Company, New York.

The Unfolding of the Ages in the Revelation of John. By Ford C. Ottman. A key to the most difficult of the Books of the Bible. Pp. 511. Price $2.00. Published by The Baker & Taylor Company, Union Square, New York.

The Church of Christ. By a Layman. A strong plea for unity in organization, teaching, and practice in the Church. The author contends that the final triumph of the Church can come in no other way. Pp. 336. Price $1.00. Published by the Funk & Wagnalls Company, New York.

Spiritual Sanity and Other Sermons. By Rev. Samuel H. Vergin, D.D. There are nineteen sermons in this volume. They are condensed, and full of original thought; vigorous, as is everything that comes from that able pen. Pp. 286. Price $1.00. Published by The American Tract Society, 150 Nassau Street, New York.

Talks to Men; by R. A. Torrey. The famous evangelist has gathered in this book ten of his popular and effective addresses on Christ and the Bible. Price 75 cents. Fleming H. Revell Company, publishers, New York, Chicago, and Toronto.

Our Own and Other Worlds, by Rev. Joseph Hamilton, D.D., has already passed into five editions, one edition of 1,500 copies being taken by the Canadian Epworth League. It is a most fascinating unfolding of the wondrous glory of the universe. The publishers are Eaton & Main of New York.

San Quentin Days, a little booklet of poems of prison life. "These poems," says the introductory, "are the heart beats through the long, dark hours of prison gloom." Some of them show considerable ability and imaginative power. Paper covers. Price 50 cents. Published by Joseph M. Anderson, 416 J Street, Sacramento, Calif.

Herbert Brown; by O. B. Whitaker. This story deals with the religious life in a small community, and some of the characters are well drawn. The writer's phonetic spelling gives an odd appearance to the pages, and spoils some scenes that otherwise might make an impression. Pp. 314; cloth covers. M. A. Donahue & Co., publishers, Chicago.

Bacteriology In a Nutshell, a primer for junior nurses; by Mary E. Reid. The author of this little volume is a graduate nurse of long experience, and the book will be of value to all interested in the modern science of medicine and its kindred subject of hygiene. Pp. 114; paper covers. Price 50 cents. For sale by the author, Cincinnati, O.

The Strange Story of the Quillmores, by A. L. Chatterton. A book by a publisher who has turned author, and who has presented a capital story, full of the excitement of romance and tragedy, attending the solving by a newspaper attache of a very mysterious case. Pp. 272; illustrated; cloth covers. Still Publishing Co., New York, publishers.

Pickway, a True Narrative; by Charles Spencer Tate. This is the biography of a young man who started in to make his way in the West, got on the down grade, but was restored to his position and self respect through a power higher than his own. The profits are dedicated to the Sunday School work of the evangelistic churches. Pp. 149; cloth covers. Price 75 cents. Golden Rule Press, Chicago, publishers.

The Menace of Privilege. A Study of the Dangers to the Republic from the existence of a Favored Class; by Henry George, Jr. The author deals with the questions of monopolies, taxation, private ownership of public highways, inequalities in the distribution of wealth, the limitations imposed upon the working classes, centralization, etc. A carefully studied treatise, well worth the attention of every thoughtful reader. Pp. 421. Price $1.50. The Macmillan Co., London and New York, publishers.

Steps in English, Book Two. This is the work of three practical teachers of English: A. C. McLean, Principal of Luckey Schools, Pittsburg; Thomas C. Blaisdell, Professor of English of the Normal High School, Pittsburg; and John Morrow, Superintendent of Schools at Allegheny. The lessons are inductive, and from the selections the pupil is taught correct use of his every day speech, and much attention is also given to effective writing. Pp. 352; cloth covers. Price 60 cents. American Book Company, New York, Chicago, publishers.

The Wisdom of the Simple. A Tale of Lower New York, by Owen Kildare. A story in this vigorous writer's best style, dealing with life in downtown New York, as no other author has yet dealt with that wonderful and mysterious region which has so long awaited the exploitation of some American Dickens. The story contains many felicitous chapters that will bring alternate thrills and tears. It lifts the curtain on scenes known to but few, and now pictured by a master-hand. Pp. 353; cloth covers. Price $1.50. Fleming H. Revell Co., New York, Chicago and Toronto, pub's.

A Few Pictures from Chhattisgarh, by Rev. J. J. Lohr, is a very attractive and interesting little book, containing forty-seven full-page pictures of the scenery and social customs of this part of India, with descriptions and explanations. The father of Mr. Lohr was the first missionary sent to India by the German Evangelical Synod of North America and is still active in the field, after more than half a century of missionary work among the people of Chhattisgarh. This good old worker is in a needy field, with native orphan children, and these little books are being sold for the benefit of the helpless ones. Price 10 cents. Mrs. K. L. Lohr, 1616 Forty-Second Street, Kensington, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Called Higher

Mrs. Andrew Wood died at her home in Stony ford, N.Y., Nov. 8, 1905, aged fifty-one years. She was an earnest Christian, a member of the Presbyterian Church of Campbell Hall, N. Y. She was a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for many years.

In memory of my dear husband, P. M. McLaren, who departed this life, Nov. 22, 1904.

"What is death to him who meets it
With an upright heart?
A quiet haven, where his shattered bark
Harbors secure 'till the rough storm is passed."

Mr. D. B. Palmer, formerly of St. Joseph, Mo., died at his home in Great Bend, Kas., October 5, 1905, aged eighty-one years and five months. He was an elder in the Presbyterian Church, and had been for many years a reader of CHRISTIAN HERALD.

On March 25, 1905, Joseph Frye was called from his earthly home at Marysville, Tenn. His more than three score years were years of usefulness and earnestness in the Master's work. He was a deacon in the Brethren Church and served his people well. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was a welcome visitor. A loving wife, four sons and one daughter sorely miss him, but he is waiting to welcome them home.

Died at her home near Arispe, Iowa, on Tuesday, Sept. 5 1905, Grandma Elliott, at the advanced age of eighty-two years and eleven months. Grandma, as she was called by all, was the mother of thirteen children, nine surviving her, five sons and four daughters. She was a noble Christian, always cheerful and kind, one whom every one loved and respected. She united with the Baptist Church in her youth and remained a member till God called her home.

On Oct. 5, 1905 Lewis P. Fuller, aged ninety-three years, eight months and eleven days, an earnest, active Christian since fifteen years of age, for many years a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The oldest veteran of the Civil War in Massachusetts, he gave up his only sons for his country's service. At the funeral services his pastor, Rev. J. H. Spencer, preached from the text, "The hoary head is a crown of glory if it be found in the way of righteousness."

The Saloon Problem and Social Reform

BY PROF. JOHN MARSHALL BARKER, PH.D.,
Professor of Sociology, Boston University.

THIS is the one book on the liquor evil that must find its way into the library of every temperance worker, every pastor, every political reformer, every school-teacher in the land. Professor Barker has made the most of his subject. The facts stated are precise, authentic and astonishing. The style of their presentation is scholarly and delightful. There is material for a sermon on every page.

The subject is treated in separate chapters from the Economic, the Social, the Political, and the Criminal aspects. There are other chapters devoted respectively to the "Educational Movement of Moral Forces," "A Medium for United Action," "The Formation of Public Sentiment," "Influential Factors in Legislative Action," "Law Enforcement Made Practical," "The Co-ordinating Power in Leadership," "Substitutes for the Saloon," and "Signs of Promise."

The book displays wide knowledge, practical common sense, and a hopeful spirit.—The Christian Advocate (N. Y.).

"The Saloon Problem and Social Reform" is a reasonable, intelligible, and earnest presentation of a line of action which should enlist wide support.—The Congregationalist.

I have read "The Saloon Problem and Social Reform." It is an excellent work, containing most valuable facts, and the book should be in the hands of every advocate of temperance reform and of every student of sociology.—CARROLL D. WRIGHT, President of Clark College.

There are 212 pages, perfectly printed and handsomely bound in cloth. Price, $1.00, post-paid. All Dealers.

Questions and Answers

Letters for this department must contain name and address of the sender—not for publication, but in order that an answer may be sent by mail in cases where the inquiry is not of general interest.

E. M. H. Royalton, Pa. 1. What are the national flowers of the following countries: Germany, Russia, Italy, and Spain? 2. Is the exclamation "darn it" swearing?

1. The floral emblem of Germany is the corn-flower, of Italy, the white lily, and of Spain, the pomegranate. We cannot find any allusion to Russia's floral emblem. 2. The expletive mentioned, while it may not be in the category of swearing, is a very common and inelegant expression. It is a clumsy substitute for an oath.

R. H., Southport. Who is the present British Ambassador at Washington?

Sir Mortimer Durand. He was born in 1850. He entered the Bengal Civil Service in 1873; Political Secretary to Earl Roberts in the Cabul campaign, and from 1884-1894 was Foreign Secretary in India. Various positions brought him to the post of Ambassador to Madrid, from which he came to Washington. He has written a number of books.

A. C., Kokomo, Ind. Is it correct to speak of a person's mental ability as "polarized talents"?

The word "polarized" could hardly be properly used in such a connection.

W. H. H., Fall River, Mass. Will the Jews ever be gathered again as a nation?

So prophecy teaches, and not the Jews only, but the other ten tribes with them. Not that every Jew will be gathered out of every nation and sent to Palestine, but that a Jewish government will be established there and a Jewish nation organized, to which the Jews in all lands will belong, as an American resident in London or Paris holds his allegiance to Washington and its administration. See Jer. 23: 7, 8; Isa. 14: 1-7, and many other passages.

G. M. H., Ore Hill, N. C., Card-playing and gambling games are condemned as immoral, by common consent of the majority of Christian churches. Besides the pernicious effect on individual character, and the dangerous associations such games involve, the example to others is a positive evil. We should do nothing whereby a brother may stumble.

Mrs. W. E. S. Russell, Kan. Where was the Garden of Eden? Would it have been possible for it to have been at the North Pole, as some people suppose?

Nobody knows definitely. The best authorities locate it in Arabia, at the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD recently published an article on the subject, by a missionary traveler, describing that locality.

E. J. McK., Lambric, Ky. 1. The children of church members are members of the church by birthright. Are they considered members if their parents neglected to baptize them in infancy? Gen. 17: 14. 2. Explain Luke 16: 9.

1. Different churches have different usages, but we believe there are none, except the Friends, who receive members without baptism. The Baptists and the Disciples administer the rite when the member is received. 2. A more correct reading is: "Make of yourself friends out of the mammon of unrighteousness," that is, by the help of it. Use it for a proper purpose. The word "mammon" here means those riches which the world values most highly and frequently abuses. The passage, therefore, would mean, interpreted broadly: Use to the highest advantage, and as a legitimate means of making good friends through your kindness and generosity, the wealth which the world so often shamefully abuses.

Reader, Williamsport, Pa. Is it true, as I have frequently heard asserted, that Mr. Blaine was a Catholic?

It is stated, upon what seems to be good authority, by Mr. Blaine's biographer, Mr. Edward Stanwood, that though his parents were both Catholics, James Gillespie Blaine was brought up as a Protestant. In one of his letters, Mr. Blaine spoke of Catholicism as his "mother's religion," implying that it was not his religion, and that at one time (probably in early life), his father had been a Protestant. When Blaine was married at the age of nineteen he professed himself a Calvinistic Presbyterian, and in 1857-58 he was a member of the Congregational Church. All his children were brought up as Protestants.

N. D. S., Hart, Mich. 1. How could Joseph be a just man if he sought to put Mary away privately? 2. Is anything known outside the Bible of the visit of the wise men?

1. Before the angel explained to him, he would naturally suppose that Mary had been unchaste. He showed leniency and consideration in determining not to make a public exposure of her, as he might have done. The message of the angel changed the whole aspect of the situation. 2. Nothing definite. They probably traveled together, entering the city at the same time, by the same gate. They were probably astrologers. Tradition says that their names were Melchior, Caspar and Belthazar, but this and other traditions about them are unreliable.

Reader, Holyoke, Mass. What is the largest bird known to ornithologists?

The ostrich. It stands from six to eight feet high.

F. D., Detroit, Mich. Paul says that every one must give an account of himself to God (Rom. 14: 12). Yet in Isaiah (43: 25), we are assured that God forgives sin if we repent. What is the meaning of the contradiction?

If you read the context, you will see that there is no contradiction, nor is there in the other passages you quote. The apostle's argument is for a large charity, based on the ground that judgment belongs to God. He is censuring men who take upon themselves the right to condemn, as many do to this day. It is practically the same warning that he gives earlier in the chapter (Rom. 14: 4). You may be quite sure that those whom Christ justifies and who are trusting in him will never be condemned.

A reader sends the following "Reverie," apropos of reading statistics of crime traced to drunkenness:

I had a vision of Paradise
With jewels all agleam;
My soul with bliss ecstatic thrilled;
But, ah, it was a dream!

Methought intemperance at an end:
That heaven came down to earth,
And the morning stars in rapture sang,
As at the Saviour's birth.

And angels, with their harps of gold,
Swept the glad strings with joy,
For the world's greatest wrong had ceased—
Love reign'd without alloy.

Speedily, Lord, may it come to pass!
Echoing spheres repeat it o'er;
"It shall come to pass——" back resounds,
Bless'd assurance! Doubt no more.

Reader, Spiker Ind. Does the statement in Heb. 12: 14, that without holiness no man shall see the Lord, imply that only those will enter heaven who are wholly sanctified in this life?

Holiness is produced in the human soul by the operation of the Holy Spirit. We do not know how it may be accelerated at the separation of the body and the spirit. There have been instances—the thief on the cross was one—in which there was no opportunity in life for the process of sanctification, as we know it, yet we have the best reason for believing that the soul entered heaven. We cannot explain how this is, but the practical duty is that enjoined in Scripture to seek holiness, to strive after it, and continually pray for its attainment. It may be that the soul striving is fitted for the presence of God the hour of death. The Holy Spirit is no limited by time. The promise that those who believe shall be saved is sure to b kept.

A. B. Auburn, N. Y. 1. How many people in the United States are unable to speak English? 2. How many dwellings are there in this country, and what is the average number in a American family?

1. An aggregate of 1,403,212 are unable to speak English, this number including only those who are over ten years of age 2. According to the census of 1900, there were 14,474,777 dwellings. The average number of people to a family, according to the same authority, was 4.7, the total number of families being 16,239,797.

A. M. S., New Virginia, Ia. 1. Was Joseph married before he became the husband of Mary 2. Did Mary have any children beside Jesus 3. Was Balaam a prophet of God or a heathen

1. Nothing is stated in the Gospels of an earlier marriage, and there are no other sources of information. 2. In Matt. 13: 55, 56, four men are mentioned as the brethren of Jesus, and their names are given. Sisters also are spoken of. In Matt. 1: 25 Jesus is described as Mary's first-born son, from which, under ordinary circumstances, we would infer that she had other children. An effort has been made to show that they were children of Joseph by a former marriage, or were cousins, but the attempt is obviously based on a desire to prove that Mary retained perpetual virginity, and there is no Scripture to support the theory. 2. Balaam was a Midianitish prophet. His position is mysterious. He wanted to curse Israel, but was held back by God's power. Evidently he knew something of God, but his conduct (Num. 31: 16) shows he was corrupt. The fact that the Israelites killed him (Num. 31: 8), shows that they regarded him as a false prophet.

An Interesting Letter

WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 11, 1905.

DR. KLOPSCH, PUBLISHER CHRISTIAN HERALD:

Dear Sir—The magnificent, "The Cruise of the Eight Hundred," a special, by which one can take a delightful journey at his pleasure, without change of cars or boat, and not be bothered by a conductor or purser, and travel all the way from Chicago, Ill., to Jerusalem, view the sights in the city, behold it from the Mount of Olives, take a bird's-eye view of the place; thence to Rome and take a squint at St. Peter's and the Vatican, the Coliseum, etc.; move on and behold with wonder many other magnificent and historical places, was received Saturday evening, and you cannot get it back for more than double what I paid for it.

"Capital Stories about Famous Americans" arrived at the same time, and it is brimful of amusing, interesting, entertaining, and instructive narratives. It is a book that can be opened at any page and the reader find it interesting. Just the thing when one has only a few minutes to read.

The "Home-Coming of the Bride" Calendar arrived this evening. In regard to this I had my expectations hoisted to the top round, but when I beheld the Calendar I found that my expectation ladder was entirely too short, and could but look with a feeling bordering on adoration. J. PERSINGER.

Miscellaneous

Della J. B., Breesport, N. Y. Thanks for your verses and kindly appreciation.

Mrs. H. A. L., Syracuse, N. Y. We have no means of supplying the information.

Mrs. O. M., Wesleyan. We are greatly overcrowded with manuscripts.

Mrs. F. H. St. J., Winnebago, Minn. Jupiter is visible prominently in the evening sky.

H. H., Exeter, N. H. There are no statistics available for answering either of your questions.

Mrs. E. K. M., Greenville, Pa. Why not write to the lady yourself, regarding the Women's Memorial.

Reader, Britt, Ia. If he has truly repented his act, and refunded the stolen money, he has done all that is necessary.

J. N., Rosebank, N. Y. We should say, on general principles, that such a person is disqualified, but we cannot judge, not knowing all the facts.

J. J. C., Snohomish, Wash. Write to A. C. McClurg & Co., 215-221 Wabash Avenue, Chicago. They can undoubtedly supply you with the book.

Mary E. S., Bellevue, Kan., 1. It is in order to prevent the election from falling on the first day of the month. 2. Solomon's Temple was burned by the troops of Nebuchadnezzar, 588 B. C.

I. M., Lynn, Mass. The passages of Scripture you refer to, were undoubtedly known only to Ruskin and his mother, and we have never heard that any list of the verses has been preserved.

Inquirer, Afton, N. Y. We know of no reason why a woman should not be capable of acting as Superintendent of a Sunday School. It is a position which calls for exceptional ability as well as spirituality, however.

Anyone knowing of the whereabouts of Willie Tryon, otherwise known as Gaspard Fait, will confer a favor by communicating with his sorrowing mother, Mrs. C. J. Fait, 20 North Temple Avenue, Indianapolis, Ind.

Miss E. K. W., Bosley, Md. I notice, in your issue of November 22, Miss K. Manitou, Okla., inquires about an additional verse to "The Bird With a Broken Wing." Here is the fourth verse, by P. P. Bilhorn:

But the soul that comes to Jesus
Is saved from every sin,
And the heart that fully trusts him,
Shall a crown of glory win.
Then come to the dear Redeemer,
He'll cleanse you from every stain,
By his wonderful love and mercy
You shall surely rise again.

Mrs. E. S. T., Scott's Mills, Oregon. At this time it is impossible for any one to predict the outcome of the great changes now going on in Russia. It may be a continuance of despotism, a constitutional monarchy, a dictatorship, or a republic.

A Native Festival in Zambesia

King Bonapandhla and his Queen

In the Village of Malahisa

IN KING BONAPANDHLA'S LAND

Strange Surroundings of an African Potentate
Christianizing the Native Heathen Children

"THE surest way to bring a heathen land into the light of Christianity," wrote an aged missionary, after a lifetime of experience in the foreign field, "is to begin with the children." This truth is impressing itself on our missionaries in many lands, and in India, China, and still more recently in Africa, the work among native children is making remarkable headway. The whole world now knows the story of India's orphan children, and how their adoption by thousands by Christian patrons in America, has resulted in an unexampled number of conversions, and in the training and sending out of hundreds of young native evangelists and Gospel workers among their own people.

What the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have been privileged, under Divine blessing, to accomplish in India, they are now striving to do in both China and Africa. In both countries, substantial progress in child adoption and training has already been made, and the number of little native boys and girls who, thanks to generous-hearted Americans, have been taken in from "raw heathenism," and are now enjoying the priceless opportunity of being trained, cared for, and supported in Christian missions, from which, in due time, many of them will go out as messengers of Truth to their own people.

Rev. E. H. Richards of the Inhambane Mission, writes of his work, and of a native ruler, King Bonapandhla, as follows:

"Some time since we decided to undertake the translation of the entire Old Testament Scriptures into the Sheetswa dialect, at a cost of one cent per verse. We know of no one to whom we can apply save the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who, being always ready for a good work, might do this great thing for three millions of benighted African people, if they knew our need. We therefore prayerfully request to petition your readers to think about helping to raise this sum for us. They have raised already $400 for our work here, and are now supporting and training some twenty-five native heathen children at $15 each per year, at our Missions, and I am persuaded they will grant us the cost for this greatly needed translation.

"Our spiritual work is spreading out finely. We printed on our own mission press five hundred Sheetswa hymn-books of two hundred pages each, six months since, and now they are every one in native hands. A like number of Primers with alphabet, and large sections of Scripture texts in them, have also been distributed in the same time. Our New Testament in Sheetswa, printed for us by the American Bible Society, is running out, over six hundred of them having been sold. The cost of each of these books is usually one day's work, or its cash equivalent. We shall have the Old Testament ready in a year, if all is well, ready for the press, and a lot of other work. We are now printing in the Tonga, Sheetswa, Gidonga and Machopa languages, and there is no one else in the land to print for these people.

King Bonapandhla's Band Playing on the Marimba, the African Piano

"A word as to the adoption of native children by our Christian patrons. Adoption takes a raw native out of the wilds, houses, clothes, feeds and teaches the pupil, and almost certainly evangelizes him. The Mission carefully supervises the choosing of these proteges. The best material, as it develops, will be put into scholarships, trained and ultimately set at work evangelizing their own people.

"We have over seven hundred children in day school, and preach each Sunday to over five thousand people. For the most part I have been alone in this work. Now Mr. and Mrs. Buchwalter are with us, and our progress will be more rapid. The record of each child is noted three times each day in the week, written down and carefully inspected each month, before the teacher can draw his little salary of $4.84 per month. Each school is inspected regularly and each pupil is carefully looked after, not only as to his moral and spiritual condition and his learning (which is carefully compared with his standing the previous month), but his food is looked after, and his cooking, his mat, his blanket, and his clothing are all inspected, and admonition given to teacher and pupil. This record is always on file in the Mission, and printed forms are supplied and carefully filled out by the teachers three times a day. Such is the care afforded the native child who is adopted and supported by a patron at home. This record is sent to each patron twice a year. Personal letters are also sent, stating such observations as may be of interest to the individual patron.

"This child adoption plan affords a fine 'light in a dark place.' The sounds of our church hymns and preaching and praise are heard by many round about. Soon the children come, and then the parents, and in a little time we have a praying and God fearing community.

"I pray you, in the name of three millions of people, come over into Africa and help us! Think of us in prayer, and as one of our native preachers had it, 'May the Lord put all these things into your heart' while you are about his business."

EGBERT H. RICHARDS."

Any readers interested in child adoption in Africa may become a sharer in the work by sending name and address to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The cost of supporting a native child is fifteen dollars a year.

Some of the photographs forwarded by Missionary Richards are of unusual interest. One group of figures, he writes, "represents our printing force. These people set up copy last year for 170,000 pages of native work, besides printing our mission paper. They receive $2.50 per month. They have printed all of our hymn-book, Primer, besides the books of Ruth, Esther, and Genesis.

A SERMON BY

Rev. Chas. M. Sheldon, D.D.

THE

Close of the Year

TEXT: PSALM 91: 1

"He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High, shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty"

A GREAT many verses in the Bible are not fully understood without taking into account the time and place of the writer. Very many of the best verses cannot be interpreted rightly without knowing somethiug of the physical surroundings, the climate, the natural scenery, and the character of the customs of the people. The Psalms especially, are rich in local allusions which have special reference to the country in which the writer lives. The Oriental land is a land of much sunshine, of long continued glaring heat. We know our own State under the familiar phrase of "Sunny Kansas." Palestine no less could be entitled to the same. Long days, weeks, and even months, the sun streams down upon the hot sands and the rocky hills of the Holy Land, until the weary traveler or the laborer longs for the relief of a cool, shady spot. The sands are glowing with the long, continued heat, the ravines are dry, and even dusty. The shimmering waves of heat rise over the hard ploughed fields; the dusty roads afford little protection from even the infrequent sycamore or palm, and the Psalmist, speaking the longings of the Oriental mind for himself and for all the inhabitants of Palestine, often breaks out in some expression of desire for coolness or shadow. "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High." He might have had in mind one of the caves which pierce the sides of the mountains about Jerusalem. He goes on to say, "shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty." People who live in fog-wreathed countries might like to talk about the sunshine of God's face, as a symbol of his love and care, but the Oriental would naturally use the other figure, and speak of the shadow of God as affording relief, comfort, and freedom from the heat and burden of the day.

A Mark of Confidence

There is much in that phrase, "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High." He who takes us into his secret, opens his heart to us as a friend. We do not share our secrets except with our friends. We esteem it a mark of confidence when a person so takes us into confidence and reveals to us something which is not common property. If you should call to see the President of the United States, and he should invite you to dinner, you would feel yourself honored; but if, after the dinner was over and the other guests had departed, the President should insist on retaining you, take you into his private office, shut the door against all others, and reveal to you some great matter pertaining to the welfare of the State; share with you some secret which he knew alone with you, for the sake of your counsel and advice, you would consider yourself more highly honored than by the invitation to dine with him. It is worth while for us to consider the value of dwelling in the secret place of the Most High. It is a matter of great privilege to be taken into the counsels of the Divine; to share with Him his high thoughts and his great plans for the universe; but that is the privilege of his children. Other men out in the world are busy with the little affairs of course; that is, if these affairs are divorced from God, they are worrying over the infinitely worrying details of the things that perish with us; but God's children, who abide in the secret place of the Most High, are taking account with the Divine of the eternal things of the universe. The Kingdom of God is the largest thought man can have. The things of the Most High belong to the endless life. The man of the world, as we use the phrase, is playing with problems, or with little sand heaps of money which the tide will wash away as it pours in at the end of the man's play day. But the man of God who abideth in the secret place, who has been taken into God's confidence, to think with him his thoughts, and plan with him his work, is dealing with enormous values, the wealth of which is immeasurable, beyond the reach of calculation by any human standard.

A Place of Safety

There is also in this thought of the "secret place of the Most High" the idea of infinite protection. The caves in Palestine have been repeatedly used as places of concealment from an enemy, places of refuge from attack. David withdrew into one of these caves while Saul was hunting him, probably many times saved himself by hiding in one of the numerous rock caves of Palestine, in some secret hiding-place known only to himself and a few of his devoted followers. It is entirely possible that the words of our text in the mind of the writer referred literally to the cave hiding-place where he felt secure. "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High," he says, calling to mind the times when he had climbed the side of some precipitous cliff, tired, overcome by heat, weary from the day-long running and climbing to escape great peril, thrust aside at the end of a long day some overhanging bush which nature had made as a cover for the opening in the side of the hill, and entering into its cool recesses, at the end of which possibly gushed some sweet spring, penetrating into the farther recesses of the shadow of this secret place, he lies down upon a couch of leaves, feeling that the enemy cannot find him in this retreat, and in the consciousness of perfect safety he lies down to sleep.

A Refuge for the Weary

In like manner, the soul of man, hunted and harassed by cares, burdened by the heat of conflict, weighed down with the long day's struggle, finds himself in the very secret place of the Most High, and conscious of that secret hiding-place he begins to be at peace. This is the meaning of this great phrase, and every child of God is entitled to all the beautiful comfort which the phrase contains. As children of God, there have been times during this year which has nearly come to its close, when we were buffeted and beaten and nigh to the place of being overcome; there have been times for all of us when the burden seemed too heavy to bear, the grief was too sharp to be endured, the struggle was too constant, the weight of the oppression on our spirits was overwhelming; no man apparently cared for our souls, we seemed to stand alone, unaided, without help or comfort. Then it has been a blessed thing for us if we have realized the meaning of sonship with God, and have experienced the reality of such close companionship with him, that it is rightly termed "the secret place."

Once in that place of refuge, the tormentor cannot reach us. The cares and worries and anxieties of the world pass by the entrance and cannot find us. The heat and stress of the long day's conflict cannot penetrate into this cooling shade. We are in "the secret place of the Most High," and the protecting arms of God are about us. Then there come to us such comforting promises as these: "If God be for us, who can be against us?" "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble. Therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be shaken into the midst of the seas"; "The Lord is my rock and my salvation, whom shall I fear?" "The Lord is the strength of my life, of whom shall I be afraid?" "In the time of trouble, he shall hide me in his pavilion, in the secret of his tabernacle shall he hide me"; "Lead me to the rock that is higher than I"; "I will hide me under the covert of his wings, until the storm be over passed." There have been times in the lives of all of us this last year when human friendship, for the time being, counted for very little. It is true life would be unbearable without human friendship, but at its best, at times, it is not good for much. There come times of stress and agony and need when the human, at its best, is limited. Then the soul cries out for God, and nothing but the Divine can satisfy.

Intimate Companionship

He that "dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High" is the only soul that lives in a sense of constant security. There is no other consolation which you can take to the bereaved, or the sinful, or the despairing, which is equivalent to this. If the past year has brought into your life any new experience worth having, I question whether it is worth having unless somewhere at the heart of it is the Divine presence. If you do not know what it means to flee into this secret place of the Most High for refuge and protection, you are depending upon broken reeds and human frailty, and when the greater stress comes, which perhaps this last year has not brought to you, you will cry out in bitterness for that which is not comfort because it is not equal to the comforting demand. He that "dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High," may rightly refresh his soul with the thought of intimate companionship with the Divine in the sharing of the divine confidence, in the uplift which comes from the knowledge that we are coworkers with God in working out the world's salvation, and also secure from the attacks of the soul's enemy. Though my soul has fled over the side of the mountain all day in the heat panting and foot-sore and weary, yet the consciousness of a secret place into which to flee before the enemy has caught up with it gives it strength to go on.

A Continuous Dwelling

The habitual consciousness, however, of dwelling in this secret place and never going out of it, is the true thought of this verse, rather than fleeing into the place of refuge, when we are driven to it by some stress of circumstance. Very many people never think of God, or heaven, or eternity, or the Kingdom of God, until some great calamity begins to chase them, until some great loss comes into their lives. Then they turn to Him. I have known families where the minister was never asked to offer prayer in the family circle until one of the family circle was suddenly called away by death, and there are many households where God's Word is not opened, and the voice of prayer is never heard except when death enters the house. It is a pretty poor sort of goodness which only begins to be good when it begins to be scared. It is a very small, narrow, contracted life, which never begins to think about the high things of God until it stumbles over some low thing and falls prostrate in the dust. Far better is it to dwell in the secret place of the Most High continually, than to run into it when night comes, or flee to it when emergency arises. It is good for us to live close to the heart of God when we are well, and strong, and prosperous. Then when the evil days come, when death smites, when sickness lays its hand on the body, when losses creep in and failures mount up,we can look these things in the face undaunted, because we have grown strong in our companionship with Him who is able to prepare us for these great events, which are not so great, any of them, as the comfort which he is able to supply.

The Year's Record

Great potency and meaning are in that one word "dwelleth." A man who dwells in a place builds a house, furnishes it. He pays taxes on the place, raises children there, he becomes a citizen, his interests are with the place, if he dwells, and that is what we are taught to do in our relation to the Most High. "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High," he is a true child of God. If that has been our habit this last year, the year has brought to us no loss so great that we have not seen an answering gain somewhere. We have met with no defeat so serious that victory somewhere else has not more than compensated. We have not been annoyed oftener than we have been encouraged. We are not reaching the end of the year with less faith in righteousness, but more. We are not standing at the end of opportunity, but at the beginning of it. All the experience of the year fast waning, even now has only added to the real faith and love of our hearts toward the higher and better things. The Kingdom of God means greater things to us, the word "service" has a brighter halo about it. The short but vital words which catch up so much of real life in them, have greater significance. The words like joy and peace, faith and hope, life and love, have new and added meaning.

God help the souls here or anywhere else who come to the end of the year's work without having known what it means to dwell "in the secret place of the Most High," and give to them and all of us the habit of living with Him as a friend lives with a friend, as a child lives with his father. We do not count the relationship of a son to a father very close if the son is continually running away from home, or only coming back to the house when he is in trouble, or when he wants to borrow money of his father. Yet we, like disobedient children, sometimes stand in the same relation to God. We do not abide in his secret place, but simply run in there once in a while. The past year, if full of the memory of defeat, and unrest, and shortcoming, may all be worth all it has cost us, if through these things we have learned he sweet lesson of the need of constant, continuous ompanionship with the Most High. "He that dwelleth n the secret place of the Most High shall abide under he shadow of the Almighty."

That is the other strong word in this verse "shall bide." It is kindred to the word "dwell." Human ife is full of things that change and pass away. Into ll our lives have come, this past year, very many evanescent and fleeting things, they have come and gone, hey have not been worth while. Into our lives, on the ther hand, have come, if we have dwelt in the secret lace of the Most High, all those things which will bide under the shadow of the Almighty. We have no ight to look upon any part of time as insignificant. The child of God, of all persons in the world, ought to espect the passage of earthly time.

The record of our year's work is now nearly completed. It is not in our power now to change it or rewrite it. Whatever it is, good, bad, indifferent, it has gone down. When you speak into the phonograph you make a record, the machine takes absolutely literally whatever you say, and it is impressed on the cylinder. There is no way of changing that record except by having off the coating of wax which contains it. But he record we have made in our use of time this last year has gone into God's book. Eternity will reveal it as we have made it, and the things which will abide with us in the life we are carrying into next year are all of them connected with the things which are eternal. "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty."

Walter Scott says, The time which passes so imperceptibly over our heads makes the same gradual change in habits, manners and character as in personal appearance. At the revolution of every seven years we find ourselves another being, and yet the same. There is a change of views, and no less of the light in which we viewed them, a change of motives as well as of action. To the child of God the process which goes on in the development of character is one of the most beautiful processes in the whole realm of God's universe. Think what a wonderful increase in faith and love and service the vision of God can do for the soul in one year's time. There is, of course, no such thing as a place of equilibrium in a human being. All life is developing one way or the other. The processes of growth upward and downward are absolute. The end of the year finds us either nearer God or farther away from him. If we have been dwelling in the secret place of the Most High, we are at this moment abiding under the shadow of the Almighty, and the opening of another year means to us the opening of another year's opportunities to know more of God and his world, of his plan for us, and the eternal grandeur of his kingdom, which is world without end. It is good for us therefore to carry into a new period of time the same everlasting truth which never passes away. It is good for us to have that in us which will abide. Nothing else is worth having, and in the end nothing else can be retained by the soul. Let us be of good cheer therefore, as we turn our faces towards the new life of a new year of time.

I cannot wish you any better wish for the new year, than that you may learn how to abide under the shadow of the Almighty. Earth's struggle is full of fever heat, its way is thorn-strewn, its buffetings are hard and constant, its defeats are bitter, its humiliations are many, its sorrows are grievous; but the soul that holds fast to the things of God, that gets up off the heated plain into the high mountain with the Most High, the soul that is not afraid to climb up not a little way, but to the Most High this soul is the one that counts life worth living, both now and in the world to come. If we have valued this past year for any noble experience, if we have wrung sweetness out of its sorrows, or compelled victory out of its defeats, let us thank God and take courage.

The world of the man of the world is a hard place. To him who sees no higher than his own head, or even heart, all men are more or less liars. There is not much faith in virtue, and not any virtue in faith. Humanity is poor material at its best, good only to get something out of. The struggle for existence is a sordid or an absorbing task for the bread and the butter, or especially for the dessert, which, even when gained, does not satisfy, but surfeits, and the years drone on and come to a close, and the new years begin and follow on with a dreary round of duties performed because there is no special faith in a higher power. But to the child of God who dwells in the secret place of the Most High, the years mean fruitage in the way of the beauties of holiness. Things are worth doing, not simply because they must be done, but because the doing of them glorifies common life. Drudgery becomes service to the Almighty if it is drudgery which the world needs for its happiness or its comfort. Contest against iniquity becomes delight, even though weariness grow out of it, to the soul that sees in the continual battle of these great forces the ultimate victory of the truth, and in every day's work or trouble, or sorrow, or loss, the soul marches with confident step, conscious of having all heaven on its side; God in the van and at the rear, and on every side, the exhilarating consciousness of ultimate victory giving one the peace of the eternal ages, although men write in their little history books, "he failed."

To you who are growing older in the human life, peace be to you as you learn the secret of dwelling in the secret place. To you who are younger, with ambition and hope strong in you, courage and faith in the great things that are worth doing in the name of God, and to all of you, old and young, turning from the things that are behind you to the things that are before, I say, "Press on toward the mark of the prize of the high calling of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." May the New Year bring to you every one a greater knowledge and a greater faith, a greater hope and a greater love, and may all of these things be possible to you because you are not draining the source of your comfort, your courage, your peace and consolation out of the small cup of your own human life; but drawing on that everlasting source which flows out of the mountains from those springs which never dry up, and gathering to yourself as the years are added to years the things that will abide, because you have dwelt in the secret place of the Most High, and have made your abode under the shadow of the Almighty.

HOW 102,000 CAME TO CHRIST

Dr. Torrey Tells of the Result of a Remarkable World-Wide Evangelistic Campaign

By REV. R. A. TORREY

A WRITER who has followed the evangelistic missions held in England and kept watch of the results, cables that in our tour around the world 102,000 persons have made public profession of accepting Jesus Christ as their Saviour, 82,000 of these being in England, Scotland, and Ireland. I am asked to tell the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD how this was done.

First of all, let me say that numerical statements of results must be received with caution. The 82,000 persons counted in Great Britain are those who have made a public profession of having accepted Jesus as their Saviour, Lord and King, and who have been registered and referred to churches. They are not merely those who have risen to express a determination to begin the Christian life. There have been many more who have done that; but these are persons who have been personally dealt with, have made a public profession, have been registered and followed up. But in spite of this care, any one who is familiar with work of this kind, will be quite confident that some, even of these, will prove like those of whom our Lord spoke as "Not having root in themselves, but enduring only for a while." But on the other hand, there have been many thousands more who, while not making a public profession of Christ in the meetings, have really accepted Christ, and have since identified themselves with the churches. Indeed, we are constantly hearing of those who have never been registered, but who have become most active Christian workers. Let any one discount the tabulated results as much as he will, there still remains cause for exultant gladness, and above all, for abounding gratitude to God, who did it all.

Dr. Torrey Addressing Seven Thousand Children and their Friends in the South London Tabernacle

As to how it was accomplished, it can be told in a few words. God did it all! He did it, because he was asked to do it, asked in faith; and he delights to answer believing prayer to-day as much as he did in the days of the apostles, or in the days of Luther, or in the days of Wesley, or in the days of Finney. The means used were the same that God throughout the centuries has delighted to honor—the preaching of the Word of God, as found in the Bible, in the power of the Holy Spirit, and the use of the Word of God in personal work. The Holy Spirit has been honored throughout the whole campaign. The necessity of his work in conviction of sin, in regeneration, in sanctification and in enduement for service, has been constantly emphasized. The workers have felt their utter dependence upon the Holy Spirit. They have believed in his living power; they have counted upon his working through them, and he has worked through them.

The work began in a prayer meeting in Chicago, at the Bible Institute. For months and years, several hundred people met weekly, from 9 to 10 o'clock at night, to pray for one thing—a world-wide revival. Then God put it to the one who had last announced these meetings, and most frequently led them: "Will you go around the world and be used as an instrument in this world-wide revival?" and he went, and God went with him.

As I look back over the four years that have passed, scene after scene of power and of glory rises before me. To describe some of these scenes would doubtless fill many a heart with joy and courage, but there is not space to tell even a few of them. Meetings were held in ten cities in Japan, in five cities in China, eight cities and towns in Australia, two cities in Tasmania, and eight cities and towns in India, twelve cities and towns in England, one city in Wales, four cities in Scotland, and two cities in Ireland. In England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales the meetings usually continued for four

What Should We Strive For in 1906?

Leaders of Thought and Action, College Presidents, United States Senators, Congressmen, Governors, Mayors, Bishops, Preachers and Sociologists Express Their Views

"What is the one thing above all others that the American people should strive for in 1906?"

Such was the timely question submitted by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to a number of prominent and active workers in various fields of endeavor throughout the country. Answers were received from twenty-five or more well-known Americans. Special effort was made to secure the opinions and advice of the presidents of universities in widely separated parts of the land, with a view to helping especially our young men and young women readers. The efforts in this particular field were highly successful, and we are sure that in the letters from the heads of universities, printed herewith, young people will find much that will aid them in making the New Year a happy one.

For the elders of the great CHRISTIAN HERALD family, here are helpful suggestions for New Year's resolutions, from leaders in Congress, heads of State and municipal governments, and from distinguished clergymen, reformers and economists.

As to what the American people should strive for in 1906—is there not work for everybody in social reform movements, in further moral development, in educational progress, in municipal, State and national improvement; in the purification of politics; in bettering the condition of the poor and of labor; in spreading the Gospel? In these various fields, what particular achievement should Americans work for, most of all? This is the problem which has challenged the special attention of the contributors whose replies, which contain much that is of real interest to all readers, are given below:

Greater Soberness in All Pleasures and All Work

DR. HORACE ELLIS, PRESIDENT VINCENNES UNIVERSITY

If the toper's phrase be allowed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I beg to submit as my answer to the question, "What one thing above all others that the American people should strive for in 1906?" this one sentence: Sober up. We have been intoxicated, thoroughly maddened, as completely insane as ever men find themselves from alcoholics—intoxicated with the wealth-getting mania; drunken with notions of experiment, wild with desire to enter upon the activities which demand adulthood, before we have discarded knee-pants. Somehow, I cannot resist the feeling that this commercial age begets a "strenuousness" akin to insanity; compels men to exhaust normally-reserved energy wastefully; to die before their time. Even this spirit which would plant a schoolhouse on every hill, a college in every community, and scatter universities with as lavish hand as Pandora dispersed her mischief-bundles, may augur something fundamentally evil, may assume the parts of the chimeras—making our people to feel that happiness comes from without; that it may be put on and taken off as a coat. Let us quietly ask ourselves: Why are we alive? One of the prime purposes is to do good for threescore and ten years, not for one-third, one-half, or even two-thirds of that time. May be the excessive indulgence by our people of alcoholics and narcotics, made necessary by the high tension under which they are forced to toil, would diminish if only we could rest. May be crimination and recrimination in the political world might decline if only we would rest. We are so very tired. May be we should recover some lost ideals, in religion, in education, in business, in statecraft, if only we should pause. Not that we have fallen too low to recover ourselves; not by any manner of means. And let us recover ourselves in this best year of time, 1906.

Vincennes, Ind. HORACE ELLIS.

Social and Political Reforms Needed

DR. ALFRED M. HAGGARD, DEAN OF THE BIBLE COLLEGE, DRAKE UNIVERSITY

I am interested in social reform, better political conditions, better care for the poor, and more justice for the laborer; in arbitration and peace among all nations, in the rights of women, in better divorce laws, in abolishing the saloon, and in spreading the Gospel to the ends of the earth. If I read the signs of the times correctly, there is a constantly widening and deepening tide involving all these interests, and bearing us into a better age. This conviction enables me to answer your question. The one thing for Americans to do is to widen and deepen this tide, and give it greater momentum than ever before. Individually each one of us should make ourselves count more than ever toward this end, by voice, by pen, by contributions, by ballot, and by a splendid personal example. The channels which are especially inviting for combined effort are those of education, especially higher, our great reform movements such as the W. C. T. U., the Anti-Saloon League, with many others; mission work at home and abroad, and lastly, a better and more practical application of the Gospel of Christ; for it is the heart and circumference of all real progress.

Restrict Detrimental Immigration

U. S. SENATOR A. J. MCLAURIN, OF MISSISSIPPI

Supposing that you mean to ask me, "What is the one political thing the American people should strive for in 1906," I answer that, in my judgment, the most important thing is a restriction of detrimental immigration.

Brandon, Miss. A. J. McLAURIN.

Drive Out the Rule of Gold and Bring In the Golden Rule

CONGRESSMAN JAMES FRANCIS BURKE, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Drive dishonesty out of the business and political life of this country. Every honest political organization should banish from its counsels the individual who dons the party uniform to pilfer the public purse, and every commercial body in the land should put the ban upon him who dons the garb of the business man to cheat his competitor by conspiring with confederates, or to rob widows and orphans of their rights by betraying the trust imposed in him by the silent inmates of the grave.

Repeal and reject the rule of gold, and re-enact and re-inforce the Golden Rule, and the moral house-cleaning which our country is just witnessing will be enduring in its results.

Pittsburg, Pa. JAMES FRANCIS BURKE.

For a Return to Old Ideals

CONGRESSMAN MARSHALL VAN WINKLE, OF NEW JERSEY

Simple living and high thinking—a return to the old ideals. The American people have now "struck twelve" in material things. Their chief concern, and the thing they should strive most for above all others, is to avoid decline and to preserve their poise, and to that end they should pray daily during the whole round year of 1906.

"Lord, let not my head grow dizzy; if my foot begineth to slip, may thy mercy hold me up."

MARSHALL VAN WINKLE.

Halt the Mad Race for Wealth

CONGRESSMAN HIRAM R. BURTON, OF DELAWARE

The greatest evil with which the American people have to contend to-day is the feverish desire for wealth. This evil, like a canker, is rapidly eating its way into the very heart of our American institutions. Wherein lies the solution? I cannot say, but it seems to me that 1906 should find the American people working shoulder to shoulder to check this evil which, sooner or later, if left alone, will prove a menace to the very foundation of our government.

HIRAM R. BURTON.

Many Tasks Rather than One

CONGRESSMAN WILLIAM H. WILEY, OF NEW YORK

"The hastening of the brotherhood of man"; "The interests of peace among nations"; "The establishment of arbitration as labor's best friend"; "The checking of the saloon evil," and "The creation of a uniform national divorce law," are fields in which all nations could afford to make progress to their general betterment.

Make War Impossible

CONGRESSMAN CHARLES C. H. GROSVENOR, OF OHIO

I am in favor of the widest and most effective conditions which will tend to make war less probable, and as far as may be, impossible. I have no line of operation marked out differing from the present plan of arbitration and conciliation. I believe that the recent war in the East was a great promoter of peace, for I believe it will so impress the people of the world with the horrors of war that war will shortly become almost impossible.

For Higher Ideals in Public Life

GOVERNOR E. W. HOCH, OF KANSAS

In the great movement that is coming up from the hearts of the people, the demand is for higher ideals in politics, for greater official integrity, for greater respect for law; in a word—for civic righteousness in every department of government.

Christianity is the basis and inspiration of this movement, as it is the hope of the world. E. W. HOCH.

Destroy the Liquor Traffic

DR. D. W. C. HUNTINGTON, CHANCELLOR OF NEBRASKA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY

That which "the American people should most strive for in 1906" is the destruction of the liquor traffic, as represented by the modern saloon. My reasons are not new, nor far away. (1) The saloon evil conflicts with the foundation law, moral and civil, that every man is bound to serve the public good, and that no individual interest should be allowed to interfere with, or prevent it. (2) The saloon evil destroys in an appalling measure the homes of our people, which are the foundation of our future welfare. (3) It is degrading the young men of the country to an alarming extent. (4) It is the greatest element of corruption in our political system. (5) It supports, and is supported, by every other vicious and hurtful scheme in the land. Destroy this, and a multitude of resulting and retaining evils would die with it. (6) It kills more men than war, terrible as war is, and kills them in a manner more savage and atrocious. (7) It is based in greed of gain and indulgence of appetite, and is thus the finished antagonism of the kingdom of God. (8) The great revival of 1857–58 was almost wholly confined to the States which were fighting the battles of the slave, and I am of the opinion that the churches of our country will never witness such wide and powerful outpourings of the Holy Spirit until they unite to put down this great abomination, which heaven abhors and the age has outgrown. America Should Lead in Work for Dumb Animals

SARAH K. BOLTON

America has long been known as a refuge for the poor and oppressed. I wish she might also be known as the great leader in work for dumb animals. Massachusetts spends thousands of dollars yearly in looking after horses and other animals, and in teaching people to be kind to the dumb. Millions could be used all over America for such work. I hope that some philanthropist will make the year 1906 notable for America's work for the speechless.

Education in Unselfish Living

REV. ASHER ANDERSON, SEC. NATIONAL COUNCIL CONGREGATIONAL CHURCHES

The problem lies in this—the education of men in unselfish lives. Selfishness makes for materialism, love of gain, lack of brotherhood. These are evils with which we all have to contend. The selfish man in industry, politics, trade, home and church, is a corrupt and corrupting element. We need not less denunciation of evil, but more discipline of evil men, who sit in the pews, and, under the guise of religion, rob the widow, cheat their fellows, and fill the week with iniquity. It is the unselfish man who seeks his fellow's good.

My observation leads me to believe that our churches are depleted in spiritual vitality, through leaving out of their messages to men, the appeal of the Cross. Jesus had the secret, gave it to the apostles, and by as much as ministers fail to learn that secret, by so much are they without power to win men to the unselfish life, a life that duplicates the spirit of Him who went about doing good. The religion of Jesus will abundantly justify itself when ministers and professing Christians generally are absolutely honest in applying his plain teachings to their individual lives.

Boston, Mass. ASHER ANDERSON.

Peace at Home and Abroad

MRS. BELVA A. LOCKWOOD, AUTHOR AND ECONOMIST

The one thing above all others that the American people should strive for in 1906, is a peaceful solution of all the difficulties or frictions now existing between the United States and foreign nations, either through the learned diplomats already appointed by the Government, or by special commissions appointed for the purpose. Should these fail, then an appeal to The Hague Court should promptly be instituted to settle all irreconcilable difficulties, as the judicial method is also the moral and Christian method of settling differences. As peace is the open-sesame to prosperity, it should be the object of the American people for the year 1906 to see that all hindering causes to peace in our country, whether with foreign nations, or internal, as with strikes, boycotts, and trusts, are removed. The Constitution guarantees to each individual life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, which he certainly cannot enjoy with a pending war, or its equivalent, a pending strike.

Apply Christianity to the Business of Life

DR. SAMUEL PLANTZ, PRESIDENT OF LAWRENCE UNIVERSITY

I know of no more important task, however, in this age when the social problem is assuming such vast proportions, than that of applying the principles of Christianity to the business life of the world. The social problem is not so much an economic as a moral question. It cannot be settled by social reorganization or by legislative action, but will be gradually solved by the application of the great ethical principles of Christianity to industrial life. If the Church and serious-minded people generally would concentrate their attention for a year on the study of the social problem from a Christian standpoint, I believe the greatest benefit would accrue to the nation that could come from any one line of thought. Righteousness and Truth in Common Life.

DR. GEORGE E. MERRILL, PRESIDENT OF COLGATE UNIVERSITY

The great task of the American people in 1906, as in every other year, should be to secure righteousness and truth in the common life. In other words, it is an ethical task. To get rid of sham, to secure truth, to live no longer a shallow but a serious life, to recognize the sacredness of law and order as the best condition under which any people can thrive; to refuse to be blinded by the glitter of dollars and to demand the solid worth of character, to learn to go slower and safer toward all goals such, I believe, would be the best task to which we could address ourselves.

For a Revival of Civic Righteousness

DR. FRANCIS E. CLARK
PRESIDENT WORLD'S C. E. U.

The American people in 1906 should strive above all else for a revival of civic righteousness. To the purification and regeneration of the governments of our cities, our prayers and efforts should be directed. God grant that the present most hopeful interest in this subject may soon result in the regeneration of our great cities. FRANCIS E. CLARK.

A Return to Foundation Principles

DR. ALSTON ELLIS, PRESIDENT, OHIO UNIVERSITY

I would have the coming year bring us no less of material good than the most prosperous of those gone by, but I would have it bring us, in addition, renewed and zealous consecration to "whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report." To think on these things, is to put ourselves in harmony with the teachings of a greater than St. Paul whose admonition means, or should mean as much now as it did two thousand years ago: "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." All reforms, whether in social, business, or governmental life, must rest securely upon the divine precept embodied in the Golden Rule. ALSTON ELLIS.

More Repose Needed in American Life

RT. REV. LEIGHTON COLEMAN, BISHOP OF DELAWARE

There is hardly anything which the American people need more than repose in their life. For lack of it, the number of people, both men and women, breaking down and dying prematurely is increasing frightfully, as is also the number of suicides. The ceaseless engagement in business and social events, not interrupted even by the Lord's Day, is sapping the very foundation of our national strength and health, and threatens dire calamities in the not distant future. Let us, therefore, have more repose.

Closer Relation Between Church and People

Purify Politics

CONGRESSMAN GEORGE A. PEARRE, OF MARYLAND

A more general and widespread benefit would result to all classes in the United States from the purification of politics in municipal, state and national governments, by the elimination of the necessity for the use of large sums of money in all elections, and this, in my judgment, can only be accomplished by an elevation of the average morals of the people, and by encouraging legislation so that they will not make it a sine qua non to the success of candidates. Separate the White and Colored Races

BISHOP H. M. TURNER, AFRICAN M. E. CHURCH

The noblest and most important work for the consideration and action of the American people in 1906, would be to separate the white and colored races. The so-called negro problem keeps this nation in a whirlpool of discontent. A racial separation should engage the attention of the nation. Such a movement would be a blessing to both races, and hence to the nation. A line of steamers between this country and Africa would bring the desired result. The negroes would leave by millions.

Introduce the Spirit of Christianity Into All Relations of Life

HON. ROBERT A. SMITH, MAYOR OF ST. PAUL

The one form of activity which I believe would be most fruitful of results for humanity, and which is indispensable to the continued existence of the representative form of government among us, is that of helping to introduce the spirit of Christianity, not only into business and finance, but into all the relations of life.

ROBERT A. SMITH,
St. Paul, Minn.

Confessing Christ

ONE hundred and two thousand souls is the remarkable harvest which report credits to the revival efforts of the Rev. Dr. Torrey and his associate evangelist in the long spiritual campaign they have just closed in Europe, Australia, India, China, Japan and other countries. God's work of grace upon human hearts has never been more wonderfully manifested in recent years than in this campaign. In almost every large city, thousands were led to confess Christ before men. And the grand total is one that must stagger those who claim that in these days the Old Gospel is losing its power.

Public confession of the Saviour before the whole world is still, as it has always been, the climax of the evangelist's efforts. It marks the turning-point in the life of the sinner—the landmark where he changed front and, leaving his sins behind, faced Godward and heavenward. While his future life may be one long, continuous struggle, with alternate ups and downs, and even frequent backslidings, yet he can keep that event steadily in memory. "Though he fall, he will not be utterly cast down," for that grace which swept him toward the mercy seat, will uplift him again and again, and if he put his trust in God, he will be stronger after each experience.

Real confession means more than a mere avowal with the lips; it means a sincere purpose and determination, with God's help, to live the new and better life. It is a glorious thing when men, having been convicted of sin, decide to come out openly for Christ. This single fact of public avowal has no equivalent in Christian experience. When once the irrevocable step is taken and the sinner steps out boldly under the banner of the Cross and declares that he accepts from henceforth Jesus as Lord and Master and Saviour, his allegiance, however rudely it may be tossed and shaken thereafter, cannot be wholly taken away. He finds fresh strength in renewing it at every opportunity. Hence, it is no uncommon spectacle to find, at our missions and revival gatherings, the same men and women renewing their public confession after many a hard battle with the sins that most easily beset them, and finding spiritual help and encouragement thereby. These poor souls, unlike others less subject to temptation, are fighting not in their own strength, but wholly in the strength they derive from Him who "saves to the uttermost." If they did not run up the flag at every opportunity, they would drift farther and farther from the right path.

If "confessing Christ" be such a means of strength and comfort to others, why not to the Christians, whose lines are "cast in pleasant places?" It would increase their influence tenfold. Too many are Christians in private, and make public avowal only on rare occasions, if at all. These miss much of the joy of religion, here and hereafter. "Whosoever shall confess me before men, him will I confess before my Father which is in heaven."

A Nation's Awakening

THERE is certainly a striking variety of view in the contributions to our New Year's Symposium, which appear in another part of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Yet it is a significant fact that the contributors—most of whom are persons who stand in the forefront of great activities, and who may be rightly regarded as makers of public opinion—all, without exception, stand united for higher ideals in public and business life.

To summarize these letters, we might say, briefly, that the central thought in the mind of the writers as a whole, is that the "best thing" to be desired by the American people in the coming year is an advancement all along the line, from the highest official to the humblest citizen, in the direction of national, civic, and individual morality. They breathe a deep and earnest aspiration that our people may become less commercial and more spiritual; that they should grasp less at the fleeting shadow, and more at the enduring substance; that their moral standard may be raised, and that the legislative, civic and business reforms lately begun may be carried forward successfully until the land is purged of many crying iniquities.

There has been of late years a growing tendency to Mammon worship—to exalt riches above character; yea, even to lay as a sacrifice upon the golden altar all that true men hold dear and sacred. Colossal fortunes amassed by monstrous injustice, corrupted courts and legislatures, venal commercial methods, mad speculation, and a general breakdown of business principles are some of the lamentable results. Thank God! the conscience of the country has been quickened. Its eyes are opening to the danger. Even in the "high places" it is now beginning to be better understood, that not great riches, nor the multitude of armies and fleets, nor the vastness of our dominions, nor the fact that we have more Crœsuses than any other land can boast, is to be of the slightest ultimate value. Righteousness alone "exalteth a nation," and the people who hold fast to any lower ideal are preparing the way to ultimate moral, social, and political disaster.

We welcome the indication afforded by the Symposium of a growing healthful tone in public sentiment—a popular desire to be right and do right before God. May the awakening of the public conscience thus auspiciously begun, grow deeper and more general in the coming year, until every state, city, and community in our land is swept into the full current of the movement for national righteousness.

The Nobel Benefaction

THE five persons who graduate this year into the order of merit, as recipients of the Nobel prizes, have now been selected. Three are Germans, one an Austrian, and one a Pole. Unlike the orders of nobility that exist in monarchical lands, they do not owe the distinction to the favor of the monarch, nor to their wealth, nor to their military prowess, nor their political services, but to their achievements in science and literature. They have laid all humanity under obligation, and the Nobel prizes are awarded to them in recognition of their services. Each will receive $40,000, that being the share of the annual proceeds of the capital sum devoted to this purpose by Alfred Bernhard Nobel, the Swedish chemist, who died in 1896. The annual income derived from this investment is divided, according to the provisions of Nobel's will, into five parts, which are to be given to the persons who, during the year, have done best in physical science, chemistry, medicine, literature, and in promoting universal peace. They are awarded this year to Prof. Lenard of Kiel, Prof. Von Bayer of Munich, Prof. Koch of Berlin, Henry Sienkiewics, the Polish novelist, and the Baroness Bertha Von Suttner, author of Down with Arms.

It was a noble thing that this philanthropist did. Too often the men who serve their fellow-men best, receive no reward. The world takes their discoveries and inventions, and uses them, without a sign of gratitude. Generally, they are men who have not the faculty or the disposition to turn their achievements to financial gain. They devote their lives to study, give arduous labor and earnest thought to their professions and, careless of their own interests, present the fruits of their toil to mankind, with no concern for their own profit. In the very first distribution of the Nobel prizes, one was awarded to a physician who, when search was made for him, was found ill and destitute in a hospital. Had it not been for the Nobel bequest, he might have died unhonored and unrewarded by an ungrateful world.

It would be well if the example of this thoughtful philanthropist were to stir some of our own millionaires to a similar benefaction. Time was when the nobility of Europe took a pride in supporting and protecting promising young men, whom they made their proteges. Gladstone, Disraeli, Goethe, and many other men who became famous, were helped by such generous patrons at critical periods of their lives. The Court at Weimar, by its patronage of genius, helped to develop a group of men whose talents thrilled the world. Nobel did well in providing for the reward of achievement; it would be a graceful supplement to his provision, if some American philanthropist were to set aside from his many millions, a sum for the encouragement of struggling aspirants for public service. Who knows how many young men, now driven by the force of circumstances to think only of the sordid details of earning their daily bread, might achieve success in science or literature, if they were relieved of anxiety about their present necessities? To see a protege serving mankind and winning fame for himself and for his country, would afford the millionaire benefactor greater pleasure than he can ever gain from mere accumulation and selfish squandering.

"Old Ironsides"

THE recent recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Bonaparte, that the Constitution, better known as Old Ironsides, the most famous ship that has ever borne the Stars and Stripes through the smoke of battle, be broken up, has shocked the patriotism of the American people, and brought forth a well-merited storm of protest. Several public-spirited men have come forward with the offer to buy it, in order that this famous vessel may be preserved to the nation; but Mr. Bonaparte now says that it is a matter for Congressional action.

The ship is at present anchored at the Charlestown Navy Yard, at Boston, and although sadly in need of repair, is far from being a wreck. Its preservation should be as dear to the hearts of the American people as Nelson's flagship, the Victory, is to those of Britain. Old Ironsides was built in 1797, her bolts being the work of Paul Revere. She served against the French, and from 1801 to 1805 against the pirates of Tripoli. In 1812 she was victorious over the Guerriere, the Java, Picton, Levant, and others. She was threatened with destruction once before by the Government, but was saved by the enthusiasm aroused by a poem of Holmes.

It is often complained that we have too few national monuments, and relics of great events in this country, and yet we seem bound to destroy those remaining. The few that have been preserved were saved, for the most part, by patriotic men and women, and not by the Government. It is to be hoped that the public protest will prevail, and that this famous old vessel will be preserved, to teach coming generations how she held the seas "in the brave days of old."

Impressions Made by Sermons

A GREAT many good sermons are preached in a great many pulpits every Sunday. Notwithstanding the fact that far too many people stay at home, there is yet a large contingent whose habit it is to worship devoutly in the sanctuary every week.

The trouble with many of these people is that they do not listen so attentively as they should to the message of the preacher. When you hear people say that sermons do not interest them, you may be reasonably sure that they have never acquired the art of steady, sympathetic and intelligent listening. No one can be genuinely interested who does not attend, in the very beginning of a sermon, to the text, around and upon which it is built. Unless you know what it is about, how are you to follow the thread of an argument? If you give merely a perfunctory and random attention, you will arouse yourself here and there to catch a story or an illustration; but it will convey to you no meaning, and give you no particular personal help.

There are sermons which leave so deep an impression on mind and memory that it is never obliterated; but in such a case, the sermon was heard. When people fidget, furtively consult watches, and wish in their hearts that a sermon was over, it will probably make on them a very slight impression. The best sermons are those which are preached to the most reverential congregations, who have gone to church in a mood of prayer for themselves and the minister, and who have remembered that they are in God's House, listening to words sent them by the Lord through his servant.

Among the Workers

—EVANGELIST W. A. SUNDAY has been conducting a series of meetings at Burlington, Ia., recently. Over 1,200 are reported as having confessed Christ within two weeks.

—REV. E. B. HAMMOND, the Evangelist, has lately been laboring among the churches of Nebraska. He is now the evangelist with the record of "longest active service," having been in the field for over forty years.

—ON DECEMBER 27, 28, and 29, a special Evangelistic Conference will be held at the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, at which it is expected that the programme of the Torrey-Alexander Spiritual Campaign for this winter will be definitely announced.

—THE CLOSING week of the New Jersey revival was marked by unabated enthusiasm. Great meetings were held in several large cities, night services were held in theatres, and street processions were a feature of the awakening. Many conversions are reported.

—REV. H. LOOMIS, of the American Bible Society, in Japan, writes from Yokohama, acknowledging a remittance through this journal, and says: "There are 24,881 sick and wounded soldiers still under treatment. Just now there is a deep interest in Christianity. Day before yesterday eighty men signified their desire and purpose to follow Christ. Pray for us."

—THE CHINESE AUTHORITIES, it is reported, are taking enegetic measures to punish the ringleaders in the recent massacre of American missionaries at Lien-chou, China. On the sixth of this month, three Chinamen were beheaded, eight sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for terms ranging from eighteen months to five years, and seven to minor punishments. A diligent search is being made for others involved in the barbarous affair, the government promising protection to all who give information.

The BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Russia in Revolt

LITTLE news of events in Russia has reached the outside world for two weeks past. The general strike of telegraphers and post-office employees, and the cutting of cables, have caused a curtain to fall over the seething confusion now extending throughout the empire. Dispatches were sent by messenger to Eydtkuhnen, in East Prussia, from which town they were forwarded by wire. From St. Petersburg, Moscow, Odessa, and the great Russian centres, this was the only avenue of communication. The paralysis of business can be imagined. The Government, driven to desperation, laid hands on the leaders of the strike and of the labor unions, and cast them into prison. Among them was the chairman of the Central Labor Committee, a man known as Krustalev, whose skill in organization has made him a power in the land. His place was promptly filled by a committee, and the strike continued. As fast as the telegraph wires were repaired, they were cut, and the workmen proved their capacity to oppose the Government.

Count Witte is evidently losing hope. In a recent interview he warned his opponents that continued disturbances were wearing out the patience of the country, and would result in the demand that the revolution be suppressed at any cost. This would be followed by the withdrawal of all concessions, and the restoration of autocratic rule. He frankly said that rather than use force, he would resign, and leave to others the responsibility for the awful bloodshed which must ensue. It becomes, however, increasingly doubtful whether the revolution could be so suppressed. The army, which would be the only instrument available for such a formidable task, is honeycombed with revolutionary sympathies, and might refuse to fire on the people. There are several instances reported of whole regiments in mutiny, and even the officers are yielding to the spirit of revolution. In this, as in other features, events in Russia are following in the track of the French Revolution a hundred years ago.

A singular and deplorable feature of the general anarchy is the hostility to the Jews, everywhere displayed. The rougher elements of the population, now liberated from restraint, find congenial occupation in attacking the Jewish residences, looting their property, outraging the women and murdering the men and the children. At Elizabethgrad, in the Kherson district, there was unrestrained riot, in which many of the Jews were literally torn to pieces and their houses burned. The hostility does not appear to be religious or racial, but to be due to jealousy of the Jews' prosperity. In some instances in which the Jews have lent money to their neighbors, murder has followed as a convenient means of getting rid of the obligation. The debtor kills his Jewish creditor to avoid the necessity of paying him.

The trend of the movement is witnessed in the Baltic Provinces of Livonia and Courland. At Riga, on the Dwina, the chief town of Livonia, a provincial government has been set up, and is supported by a majority of the troops. The Governor and other officers were thrust into prison, and a Republic proclaimed. The population is chiefly German, having little sympathy with the Russians, and has long been restive under Russian domination. The people have been severely oppressed, both by the German barons and the Russian governors. They have had not only to pay rent, but to pay for the right to fish in the bay, and for other privileges. Their condition has been like the vassals of feudal times, and the exactions imposed upon them were vexatious and cruel. The peasants appear to have led the revolt, and to have induced the workingmen of the towns to assist them. They have declared war on their oppressors, and are burning their mansions and distributing their property. The province has now been placed under martial law, and a Governor-General has been appointed to restore order; but the task is one that would require a stronger force than Russia is believed to have at command. It seems possible that the heterogeneous races of Russia may separate in this manner, if the Czar's Government does not speedily recover its virility; and so the unwieldy nation may disintegrate, and the warning of the prophet against the spoiler of the people be fulfilled.

Because thou hast spoiled many nations, all the remnant of the people shall spoil thee: because of men's blood and for the violence of the land and of all that dwell therein (Hab. 2: 8).

Russian Rioters Selling the Loot of Jewish Houses

To Fight Consumption

A remarkable exhibit in the war against tuberculosis has been on view in the American Museum of Natural History in New York, for several days. It is a contrast of favorable and unfavorable conditions for the development of consumption. It was a model of a typical city tenement of over a thousand rooms, one-half of which had neither light nor air, except through an adjoining room. It was just the kind of dwelling to cause the disease, and to develop it if it already existed. The contrast was a model of an improved tenement, with access to light and air, special dishes and table utensils, and model chairs and sleeping-bags for use on the roofs. In the recent conference, it was conclusively demonstrated that the disease is the offspring of foul air and of unsanitary conditions. It was also demonstrated that in its early stages it might be cured, by a change to pure air and cleanly surroundings. There are exceptions to both rules, as consumption sometimes invades the families of the wealthy, in spite of the best conditions, but in the large majority of cases the disease is preventable. Like other investigations, this shows that the ancient philosopher was right in his principle:

The curse causeless shall not come (Prov. 26. 2).

The English Cabinet

The new Cabinet which Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman has called into existence, is an assembly of remarkably able men. It was not thought possible that the shrewd Scotchman, who is now Premier, could have enlisted so strong a group from the ranks of the Liberal party. They are, as a rule, untried men, but men who have won respect in their position as members of Parliament. One of the most notable appointments is that of Sir Edward Grey to be Secretary of State. He is a man different in all respects from his predecessor, a vigorous, decisive man of firm character, and possessing the confidence of the King, who exercises more influence on foreign affairs than did his mother. Another significant appointment is that of John Burns, who a few years ago was an ordinary working man, but now, as President of the Local Government Board, occupies a position among the chief statesmen of England, with a salary of $10,000 a year. It is gratifying to notice that an important office has been confided to Mr. Herbert Gladstone, a son of the late statesman, and that Lord Elgin, a man of intelligence, succeeds Mr. Lyttelton as Secretary of the Colonies. The crucial appointment, of course, is the Secretary for Ireland. This is given to Mr. James Bryce, and Mr. Morley, who formerly held it, is now Secretary for India. It may be hoped that one of the first duties the new Government will undertake will be the repeal of the odious Education Act, which has involved Dissenters in so much suffering and loss. We may hope that the new Government will prove such as Moses was directed to appoint.

Thou shalt provide out of all the people able men: such as fear God, men of truth, hating covetousness, and place such over them (Ex. 18: 21).

An International Difficulty

A dispatch received recently at the Brazilian Embassy in Washington, D.C., reports an affair that may involve international complications. It appears that a man of German parentage, who had not filled his period of service in the German army, went to Brazil and settled at a small town in the State of Santa Catalina. He had been there about a year when a German gunboat went to Brazil. While the officers were on shore in civilian dress, they visited the town in which the German citizen had settled. They learned all about him, and finding that he was, according to their view, a deserter, they seized him and carried him on board ship, and have taken him back to Germany. His friends in Brazil have appealed to the Government, which has notified our Department of State of the outrage. It may be that there are some grounds for the seizure not disclosed in the dispatch, but if not, the Brazilian Government has reason for complaint, which will doubtless be pressed. What a consolation it is to the Christian, that in his case there can never be such a seizure. The power he served in the days of his sin can never recover his allegiance.

I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand (John 10: 28).

Missing For Forty Years

A citizen of New York was astonished recently by the appearance at his home of a stranger, who claimed to be his brother. There was reason for surprise in the fact that the only brother he had, had been missing since 1865. He had gone out with the casual remark that he was going to buy a book and would be back in an hour. As he did not return, search was made for him, but no trace could be found. The story he told, when he presented himself a few days ago, was that a blank came in his mind after leaving his home, and he knew nothing until he found himself on board a ship bound for Australia. In that country he prospered, went into business for himself, and made a small fortune. Then he went to South Africa, where he made more money. Finally, when his fortune approached a million, he had an illness, during which he recovered his lost identity. He recollected his name and place of abode, and determined to return. He had been away forty years, during which he had been practically a different person. The physicians may perhaps be able to explain a form of dementia, that rendered the man oblivious of his past while leaving him capable of making a fortune. No medical experts are needed, however, to explain the conduct of men who wander away from God and forget their obligations to him, while they succeed in business.

The cares of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, choke the Word and he becometh unfruitful (Matt. 13: 22).

THE SHEPHERDS FIND JESUS

Sunday School Lesson By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

THE Mother of Jesus was a tender legacy that Jesus gave from the Cross to the "beloved disciple" John. These were the words of the Testament; to his mother he said, "Woman, behold thy son;" to John, "Behold thy mother." It is recorded that "from that hour that disciple took her unto his own home." Mary must have often talked to John about Jesus, telling him over and over again the incidents of his early life, particularly those connected with his childhood, for she had "kept all these things and pondered them in her heart." And when the story reached the time that Jesus "went about doing good," John would tell Mary many things he had seen and heard as "the disciple that Jesus loved." Luke also may have learned those first chapters about Jesus and John the Baptist from the lips of Mary.

We can imagine some such talk as this between the two. "Mother," says John to Mary, "now that Jesus has gone back to heaven, tell me the sweet story of how he came from heaven to you on that first Christmas day. And Mary perhaps answered: "I was a girlish maiden, of the despised village of Nazareth, betrothed to Joseph, a young carpenter, but not yet married, when one day there appeared to me in our humble cottage a glorious person, who said, as I shrank away in fear: 'I am the angel Gabriel, sent from heaven to tell you that you are to be the mother of the long-promised Messiah; for the power of the Holy Spirit shall overshadow thee, and the Holy One shall be born of thee, seed of the woman and Son of God.' Soon after I went and told my cousin Elizabeth, and in doing so my soul burst into song:

"My soul doth magnify the Lord,
For he hath looked upon the low estate of his handmaid;
For behold from henceforth all generations shall call me blessed.

"About nine months after the angel's annunciation, our Roman Emperor, Augustus Cæsar, ordered every one to go to his ancestral city to be enrolled in a census, and so Joseph, my betrothed, must needs go to his ancestral city, Bethlehem, for he was a descendant of David, though only a workingman. He took me with him, and that is how Jesus came to be born there, where Micah had foretold the Messiah would be born. For many years I was unable to reconcile the glorious promise of the angel that Jesus would be called 'the Son of the Highest,' with the circumstances of his lowly birth. At Bethlehem there was no room for us in the inn, but knowing that my hour had come, I was grateful for the shelter of the stable. And there Jesus was born.

"Suddenly lowly visitors appeared, shepherds from the near-by fields. As soon as they spied my little one, they said, in reverent wonder, 'Yes, there he is; just as the angels told us.' And when Joseph asked them the meaning of their visit and their words, they told him that when they were out in the fields, watching their flocks in the dead of night, a great light had suddenly appeared, which so frightened them that they fell upon their faces and did not rise until they were reassured by an angel's sweet voice, which told them there was nothing to fear, for they had only come to tell them that a child was born who would make the whole world glad. The shepherds told Joseph how when they looked up they saw a great multitude of angels and heard them singing a wonderful song of 'Glory to God.' 'We have come here,' the shepherds said to me, 'because the angel told us that we would find the wonderful babe wrapped, like any other child, in swaddling clothes and lying in a manger.' And then the shepherds fell on their faces in the stable, not in fear this time, but in worship of my little one, 'Son of the Highest.'

"And when they were gone, and Joseph and I were alone with the babe, I was as one bewildered. It was all now a wonderful treasure of memory that grew dearer every time I pondered it."

"They came with haste, and found Mary and Joseph and the Babe"

Illustration and Application

A man of the Basuto tribe, working in a coast town of Africa, heard a missionary preach, and became a Christian. After a while he went back to his people. On his departure, the missionary gave him a Bible, in the coast language which he had been taught to read. For twenty years, far from any missionary station, he read that Bible to his people, translating it roughly into his native tongue. Then he came to a missionary to get a Bible in Basuto. His own was worn almost past using. As he took the dilapidated book from a sheepskin case to show it to the missionary, he stroked it lovingly. "This," he said, "is the Bible the old missionary gave me long ago. He is dead, but this book lives. It is getting old—no, it is getting worn, but the Bible never gets old." And we may add that the story in it of the world's Saviour and King, most of all, never gets old. Let us consider the angel's message as, (1) a song in the night, (2) a song to the poor, (3) a song to parents, (4) a song for childhood.

1. A Song in the Night. At the time when the plague known as the "Black Death" was sweeping over the world, destroying thousands, many hid themselves in their closed homes, afraid to meet their fellows lest they should fall by the awful contagion. This continued in the town of Goldberg until Christmas Eve, when one man, thinking himself the only person left alive, unbarred his door at dead of night and ventured out into the air. In the lonely street, to comfort his soul, he struck up a Christmas carol:

To us this day is born a child,
God with us!
His mother is a virgin mild,
God with us!
God with us! Against us who dare be?

Through a barred door came another voice in response to his own, and then the door was flung wide, and a man joined him in the street and sang with him. Together they marched through the town, where had been heard only wails and cries of terror since first the plague descended upon it. The song woke strange echoes. From their living tombs men, women, and children came forth to the number of twenty-five—all that were left of the town—and marching through the death-stricken streets, they sang with new courage, "God with us! Against us who dare be?" Whether it was that the plague had spent its violence, or, which is more probable, that the minds of the survivors were more serene, none of this little band died of the "Black Death." They returned to their homes, buried their dead, and the town began to awake. The incident was remembered, and for centuries the town continued to meet each Christmas Eve at midnight, and at two o'clock the people marched through the streets singing the same old hymn.

And that song is appropriate for every night of sorrow, to recall that it was in the night that Jesus came to the world's rescue, and that it was at night the angel song brought light and "peace." "God with us! Against us who dare be?"

2. A Song to the Poor. Later the Magi came, representing the educated and powerful, but the first Gospel song was sung by angels to shepherds. So in every age it has been the poor who have been first to welcome the Christ, who came to them as a child of poverty, with a cradle than which none was ever lowlier. After the benediction of a church service, it was noticed by some of the last to leave that one woman remained in her pew. Fearing she might be sick, one went to her and found her face transfigured with the peace of a Christian death. "Princess Washerwoman" was the title given her by one who wrote her story. She had gone often from her hard toil at evening, singing peacefully to herself,

The Field of the Bethlehem Shepherds

One more day's work for Jesus.

And in her humble cottage she would often sing as she prepared her simple meal,

I'm the chi'' ' of a King.

At last, in the church, the King's throne-room, she had met him face to face.

Labor and poverty have been glorified by Christ's poverty and labor, and by his many fellowships with the toilers.

3. A Song to Parents. When the Son of God became the Son of Mary, God glorified human parenthood as a sacred honor. Before that, woman was despised, and marriage regarded as hardly better than a necessary evil. In Mary we see parenthood in its true glory as a share in divine creatorship, and the very crown of human life. In completing the statue of manhood and womanhood there is nothing, save the touch of God in conversion, equal to

The little hands on breast and brow
To keep the living heart cords tender

George Eliot, in Silas Marner, pictures an old weaver, soured by injustice, wrongfully suspected of crime, eating his soul out in solitude, possessed by a consuming love of gold, which he had buried under the floor of his cottage, who is robbed of his gold, but on that same night, when almost crazy over his loss, he finds a child left upon his doorstep, beautiful, helpless, appealing, who becomes his saviour and sanctifier. Caring for that child transforms his soul. So, many a man has found his noblest life through ministry to a child.

4. A Song of Childhood. The Christ came as a child to teach that a child may come to Christ. Luther wrote for his little Hans:

Ah, dearest Jesus, holy child, make thee a bed, soft, undefiled,
Within my heart, that it may be a quiet chamber kept for thee.

In a certain home in England, three children—Archie, Amy and Mary—were accustomed, after getting ready for bed each evening, to gather about Aunt Mary for a story and a song. After the story one night, Archie called for the song of "The Ninety and Nine." Amy, who was very self-willed and often naughty, said, "No, no, don't sing it," and quite angrily put her hand on Aunt Mary's lips. But Aunt Mary took the little hand away and sang the hymn. Amy was still angry, and said scornfully, "I never went astray, I was never 'sick and helpless and ready to die.'"

A few days later, when Amy was shut in her room for all day as a punishment for repeated disobedience, Aunt Mary came in and said, "Amy, don't you see you can never say again, 'I never went astray,' and I was never 'sick and helpless and ready to die.'" On another evening, soon after, Archie again asked for "The Ninety and Nine." After a verse or two, he said earnestly, "Who was it that went astray?" And Amy, snuggling on the other side of Aunt Mary, whispered, "It was Amy who went astray. It was Amy who was 'sick and helpless and ready to die.'"

Turning a New Leaf

A NEW YEAR'S STORY

By Alfred R. Calhoun

ALLEN FORBES had the confidence of his employers, the respect of his associates, and the love of his family. He lived in an ideal cottage within sight of the towering chimnies of the Vulcan Machine Works, of which he was to be superintendent from the first day of the coming year, an enviable position for a man just forty.

It was half-past eleven of the last night of the old year, and Allen Forbes and his wife, a slender, dark-haired woman with a gentle, patient face, were seated before a blazing wood fire, while their son George, a handsome youth on the verge of a promising manhood, and his sister Clara, a decidedly pretty girl of twelve, sat reading at a table near by, and now and then glancing at the tardy clock, whose white frame was still encircled by the holly of the Christmas just past.

"Father!" the girl came over, and from the back of the chair drew her arms about her father's neck. "Do tell us a story that will last from now till the new year."

"A story?" repeated the father, and he covered the little hands with his own big, hard palms. "Why, I think I exhausted my stock of stories at Christmas."

"Oh, you know lots," she protested.

"Well, what kind of story do you want, little girl?"

"A really truly true one," she replied, with a caress.

"A true story!" Allen Forbes coughed, looked at his wife and then at the clock; but it was not to time what was to follow.

At the prospect of a story from his father, George pulled his chair into the circle before the fire, and Clara sat on a stool where she could lay her hand on her mother's knee and watch the play of the changing lights in the brave, kindly eyes.

"Well, then, a true story, every word of it true, for I knew the man of whom I am going to tell you. Let us call him 'Donald Nelson'—that wasn't his name, but the name doesn't matter." Allen Forbes glanced at his wife, who sat with her eyes on the fire, and the slender fingers of her right hand revolving her wedding-ring; then his glance took in the children, and this is what he said:

"Fourteen years ago to-night, Donald Nelson was six and twenty years of age, and all his friends said that he ought to be a very happy man; and he was happy, for he was a master machinist, and he had a wife whom he loved, and who loved him, and a baby son whom they both loved. Youth and health, and the content that comes from congenial work, fairly well rewarded, should have made Donald Nelson content, but he wasn't. He saw the great mansions, and the carriages and ostentatious display of the rich, and he hungered to possess those things, not for himself, for he was naturally modest in his desires, but for the sake of Mary, and Freddy the baby.

"If I could save up a few thousand dollars, I might make a start for myself, and in time own great works and be an employer, rich and prosperous as those to whom I am now an employee; and then Mary could ride in her own carriage, and Freddy would have a nurse, and a governess when he gets old enough to learn. But how can a man lay by a few thousand dollars, with his wants growing greater day by day, and his wages of eighteen dollars a week remaining the same? That is how Donald Nelson reasoned then; that is how many men in his position reason to-day; and I need not tell you that such reasoning does not make for content.

"Well; about this time a great misfortune befell Donald Nelson, though he thought it a great good fortune; he inherited thirty-five hundred dollars from a maiden aunt; and for the time he felt, as he said himself, that he had 'the world in a sling.' Resolutions are only good, whether made at the close of one year or the beginning of another, when they are strictly carried out. Donald Nelson, when dependent on his weekly wage, believed that if he had the means, he would at once start a shop of his own; but now that he had the means, he was persuaded by 'friends' that such a way to wealth as he proposed, was altogether too slow for these days of flying transportation and lightning-conveyed thoughts. The young man listened to his friends, who told him of vast fortunes made in a few months, and with less capital than he had; and the place where these fortunes awaited men of initiative and daring was Wall Street, the money heart of the great metropolis just across the river.

"Donald Nelson fell on his knees, and cried out, 'Forgive me!'"

"Donald Nelson knew, and the knowledge gave him pleasure, that he was popular with his fellow workmen, and a few outside acquaintances; but he never dreamt that he had so many interested friends till the news of his inheritance went abroad. His wife, ever thoughtful and sweet, begged him to keep on with his work, and put the money in a savings bank till a good chance came to invest it; but men, with more experience than he had, have rejected the advice of their wives, whom they regarded as foolishly timid and naturally ignorant of business; and so he ignored her counsel and listened to that of his friends. He gave up work 'for a short rest' and 'to take a look around,' he said; and the better to look around, he went over to the great metropolis, and with the companions who clung to him so closely now, he sauntered into Wall Street, not to gamble, but to see the arena where daring men won fortunes without toil. The sight delighted him, for the wrecks of hope, the blasted lives, and the broken hearts of the innocent are never on exhibition in the haunts of the men who grow rich on such ruin.

"Donald Nelson was what is known as 'a temperate, but not a temperance man.' He belonged to the self-assertive class, of whom all drunkards are made—the men who can drink or leave it alone. The new friends were of the same class, but they preferred not to leave it alone when some one else paid the bills; and with the generosity that comes with leisure and a sudden fortune, Donald paid the bills on the occasion of that first visit to the maelstrom of speculation. If his wife had been familiar with the odor of intoxicants, which she was not, she would have known, when her husband returned so full of needless laughter that night, that he had been drinking.

"The second day of his leisure, the friends induced Donald to go to the Coney Island races. He had never witnessed a contest of speed between horses before, and being told that there was no pleasure in the exhibition unless one bet, he bet ten dollars. The conditions were that if he won, the bookmaker, as such gamblers are called, would pay him ten dollars for one. He won—won a hundred dollars in as many seconds, and without a stroke of work. Now he had found the lightning express train on the road to fortune, and he got aboard. That night Donald Nelson was unsteady on his feet and incoherent in his talk when he reached home, and the innocent little wife thought him ill and got him to bed.

"After this he went every day for a week to the race track. Oh, the excitement of it—when one is winning; and though Donald did not win on every venture, at the end of seven days he was what his friends called 'ahead of the game' by one thousand dollars. A thousand dollars, and not a cent of the inheritance spent! A thousand dollars, and not a bead of sweat nor a stroke of toil! Aladdin's lamp was a slow affair compared with this method of conjuring up wealth.

"But, racing was driving but a single horse along the road to fortune, Donald's friends told him. 'Work Wall Street at the same time,' they said, 'and you will be driving a double team, and get to your end in half the time.' And so he speculated in Wall Street, and his first efforts were phenomenal. A few months of this and he would be richer than the firm for whom he had ceased to work, and he would own a mansion, and Mary should have diamonds and a carriage, and baby could have a dozen nurses if they were needed for his care and delight.

"And now he came home later and later every night, and his steps grew more unsteady, and his talk more incoherent and boastful, till the suspicions of the faithful little wife that her husband was becoming a drunkard, were confirmed. She prayed and wept in private, as only such women do, but openly she tried to appear cheerful, and endeavored to win him back to the better life, and he responded with laughter, and sought to appease her anxiety by stuffing wads of bills into her trembling hands. When Mary learned where the money came from, she refused it with loathing, and drew back lest she be stained by the contact; and yet her love did not weaken, but followed him down and down, without herself descending to the depths to which he was falling.

"There could be but one end to such a course as Donald Nelson was pursuing, and it needed no gift of prophecy to see it; but he who felt the blow was the last to understand its cause. In a few months the tide of success turned as rapidly as it had set in, and it swept on and out, and with it went all Donald's winnings, and all his inheritance, and the few dollars Mary had put aside for a rainy day, and health, and strength, and self-respect; but there remained behind, as a heritage of the venture, a double for the old work and an overmastering desire to appease the thirst for drink.

"And now the new friends left him; the old acquaintances avoided him, for his face was swollen, his speech thick, and his clothes disreputable. There was left only Mary's love and—and the habit—the habit that was destroying him body and soul. Article by article the household belongings went to the second-hand

A Story of the days of Religious Persecution in England

BY JOSEPH HOCKING

CHAPTER III.—Continued

"WHAT have I said or done that is wrong, your Majesty?" asked Trelawney.

"Away with him," said James, "and see to it than he gets his deserts."

"A canting Presbyterian, a lying knave," snarled Jeffreys.

"I am neither the one nor the other," said Benedict Trelawney. "Although you are not worthy of an honest man's sword, I will e'en meet you when and where you will."

"A brawler," cried Jeffreys. "Officers, drag him back to prison, I'll make him smart to-morrow."

A few minutes later, Benedict Trelawney was dragged up Whitehall and along the Strand. At first he was dazed by all that had taken place, but presently it all became clear. This was King James then. This was the king who was never worse than his word. This was the man from whom, in spite of all he had heard, he was sure he would get justice.

His heart burned with anger as he was dragged along. A crowd surrounded him, some jeering, while others evidently sympathized with him.

It was now nearly dark, and thus it sometimes became difficult to walk, for great heaps of rubbish lay along the street, over which he more than once well-nigh fell.

Presently one of his warders stumbled and nearly fell. This was caused by a great heap of bricks in the street, but which he had not been able to see in the gathering darkness. Besides, as they went further towards the city, Benedict Trelawney saw that they were entering a fog, which was moving slowly westward.

"What hath the youth done?"

"Naught but called Jeffreys a liar."

"Surely he hath not done that."

"Ay, but he hath. I was at the Guildhall myself this very day, and heard him with my own ears. A nephew of the Bishop of Bristol, too."

"A nephew of Trelawney, eh? And he dared to call Jeffreys a liar?"

"Ay, he did, and made no bones about it."

"What will happen to him?"

"What happens to all against whom Jeffreys hath a grudge. The pillory, the cart-tail, ay, and who knows, the gallows. You know what Jeffreys is."

All this and more young Benedict Trelawney heard as he trudged towards Temple Bar, and he began to realize the fate that awaited him. He remembered the words of both the King, and the Chief Justice, and he knew what he might expect. For the first time he noted his warders. There were four in all. One walked on each side of him holding his arms, one went in front and another behind. All around was a straggling crew, some watching the little procession with curious eyes, others shouting to the people who looked out of the windows, others jibing at the officers who guarded the young Cornishman.

"Some good strong drink would be acceptable on such a cold night," said one of the guards to another.

"Ay, we will take this young fighting-cock back to his perch, and then we will get it."

"It would not be safe to stop and get a drop on the way, would it? The marrow in my bones is fair chilled."

"Nay, it is but a few minutes to Fleet Prison."

"Ay, but when we get there, perchance there will be other jobs to do, and then we shall not get our drink. Here is a tavern."

"Ay, there be taverns enough; but you know what my lord Jeffreys said."

"What doth five minutes matter? Besides, we owe no grudge to this young springald. He hath done us no harm, save to keep us in the cold. Let him have a little fresh air while he can. He will have little of it this night."

"Work first, and drink after," said one of the warders. "Besides, the rabble is not in a good temper."

This he said because more than once someone had jostled him and had called him "Jeffreys' hireling."

By this time they were nearing Temple Bar, and the fog having thickened, it was more difficult to see what lay in the road. But Benedict Trelawney, although he knew but little of London fogs, had keen eyes. Besides, while on his way to the King, he had noticed a deep trench which workmen had dug in the street, and knew now that he was drawing near it.

"My name is naught to you" said the girl. "Why should it be?"

As the fog thickened the crowd grew less, in truth as they passed the old Globe Theatre, Benedict saw that only a few accompanied them. One, however, remained nearby, which he noticed particularly. This was a young girl, not clothed as a peasant, and yet one who wore not the attire of a gentlewoman. Several times during the journey she had drawn near him and had made motions to him which he could not understand. He had noticed too that she had been foremost in inciting the rabble to flout the officers who guarded him. He felt sure that if he could gain his freedom, she would be his friend.

Without attracting the notice of those who held him fast, he looked out keenly for the trench which had been dug in the street, he noticed too that the girl marked his action, and seemed to understand it.

"Come," said one of the guards as the street became empty, "this is better. Better fog than the rabble."

"Ay, but I can scarce see my way."

"What of that? we can see the houses on either side."

"Ay, but there is many a pitfall and rubbish heap in the way."

"And thou art as blind as a bat," said the girl.

"Get away, or I'll clap thee into jail."

"Now would you?" said the girl. "But it would be much trouble, so much that you would be glad to get rid of me before you got me there. Why, if I was your prisoner I'd be free in less time than it takes Westminster clock to strike twelve."

"Would you? and how, my long-tongued wench?"

"I would e'en take you to the pitfalls on the other side of the street, instead of keeping this side."

"What pitfalls?"

"Why the one just before you get to the end of Chancery Lane, and then, now then! I would just give you a push like that!"

She had marked the time exactly, for they had at this moment come to the hole which Benedict Trelawney had seen. What he had intended to do himself had been done for him; two of his guards lay floundering in the hole which some workmen had been digging, and had relaxed their hold on their prisoner as they fell.

"Come!" she whispered. He followed her as quickly as possible, but was unable to go as fast as he would have liked. His hands were closely pinioned by leathern straps, and this checked his speed.

"My hands," he said. "Have you a knife?"

He saw a gleam of steel in the darkness, and a moment later he felt himself free.

He heard footsteps close behind him, and the shout of angry pursuers.

"Shall we hide here?" he whispered. "The fog is so dark that they cannot see us."

"No, come on. There, hold my hand, I know the way."

He grasped her hand, and she led him swiftly by the Temple Church, where they hid for a time, and through the cloisters into the gardens. Behind them he heard the footsteps of pursuers.

No sooner had they reached the broad space outside the cloisters than the girl, instead of making for the river, as he had expected, turned again towards Fleet Street. She led the way through a narrow, winding alley until they were in the main thoroughfare. Arrived here, the girl stopped and looked around.

"We are not followed," she said; "but never mind, let us turn up here."

Still holding her hand, he kept by her side up one of the many courts which stood on the north of Fleet Street, and when they had gone some little distance the girl stopped and laughed.

"You are a brave girl," said Benedict, "and I thank you with all my heart."

"Ay, but what are you going to do to-night, Sir Squire?"

"Truly I have not thought," he replied.

"The hue and cry will be out in ten minutes, and then woe to us if we are caught. Oh, but what fools men are. Hark! There!"

Benedict heard an angry shout nearby, and to his dismay, he saw that although daylight had now quite gone, the fog was lifting.

"Come," she said, "it is your only chance," and again taking his hand she led him away in the direction of Holborn.

CHAPTER IV.

"WHO are you?" said the youth, presently. "I would e'en know your name. I would like to see your face, too."

"Why, Sir Squire?"

"A man always likes to see the face and know the name of a friend. And you have been a friend to me. I doubt if ever I should have got away but for you. I think I should have upset those fellows in the trench; but my hands being tied I should have had no means of defending myself."

"Leathern straps! Faugh!"

"Ay, but they were fastened tightly around my wrists. I might have broken them but I do not think so. But you were a friend in need. You cut them just in the nick of time. And I must get back my sword, too."

"Your sword?"

"Ay, it was taken from me this morn in the court-house. I must get it back whatever befals. Not so much because it is valuable, but because it has been in our family for generations. I must get it, even although I break into Fleet Prison and take it."

He said this quietly, but with such an air of assurance, that although he mentioned a task that seemed impossible the maid did not laugh.

"But tell me who you are," he went on, "and look 'e, there is a light close by. Let me see your face."

"Why should you see my face!"

"Because I would like to know you again. You kept it hidden all along the Strand, so that I caught scarcely a glimpse of it. I am glad you did this, for I would not like those rough men to be peering at you. But now tell me, what is your name?"

"Mary," said the girl.

"Mary! Well, it is the sweetest name we have, although it makes one think of a cruel queen. Nevertheless, the Mother of our Lord was also called Mary, and it also makes one think of purity and loveliness. But what besides? Mary what?"

"I shall not tell you," replied the girl.

"Why will you not tell me?"

"My name is naught to you. Why should it be? I am going to see you to a safe place, and then you will never behold me again."

"Nay, but I cannot allow that."

"You cannot help it. Besides, I can never be aught to you. You are a nephew of my Lord Bishop of Bristol. Even such as I have heard of the Trelawneys of Cornwall. Therefore, how can you care to know me, a poor girl?"

"That is where you puzzle me. Sometimes you speak as though you were a grand lady, and again as though you were the daughter of some shopkeeper."

"And what if I were the daughter of a shopkeeper?"

"I should still think of you with a grateful heart. But let me see your face, and I can tell whether this is true."

"Can you?" said the girl, with a laugh. "Can you tell whether I am a lady of quality by looking into my face?"

"Ay, let me look at your hands, and your face, and I shall know."

"Well, I will try you. Now, then, here is a light and no one is near."

She threw back her headgear, and stood in the light of a window close by. The candles which burnt within were not brilliant, but they revealed her face sufficiently clear for young Benedict Trelawney to trace its outlines without difficulty. He noticed, too, that she was tall, so tall that, although he stood six feet high, he had scarcely to stoop at all in order to place his face on a level with hers.

As far as he could judge she could not be more than eighteen or nineteen years of age, and it was a face which, when once seen, was not easily forgotten. Moreover, it seemed to change several times while young Benedict Trelawney looked at it. When his eyes first caught hers, he saw the features of a careless, happy, mischievous girl. He saw a pair of large gray eyes, which were brimming over with fun, a pair of rosy lips parted by laughter, revealing even rows of white teeth. He saw a face, flushed by adventure and crowned with a wealth of glossy brown hair, which, in spite of all her endeavors, had escaped from its fastenings and hung in stray tresses over her forehead, and neck.

"A mischievous child who has escaped from her father's house, and followed the crowd out of pure mischief," was Benedict Trelawney's first impression, but before the thought had fastened itself upon his mind, he saw the maid's eyes gleam with anger, while her face worked as if in pain. This expression was again followed by a look of sorrow and despair. A look of unutterable longing and sadness came into her eyes, and he saw her lips tremble, as though she would burst into sobbing.

"I can't make her out," said Benedict, half to himself, half to the girl.

At this, she hastily covered her face, and drew herself up proudly.

"Good-night, Master Trelawney," she said. "I have been foolish enough to give you your liberty. Pray leave me before I repent, and give you over to justice."

"Leave you," said Benedict. "What! before I have told you whether you are a lady born, or a peasant? Leave you before I know your name, and how we can meet again?"

"We shall never meet again," said the girl; "but —" she was silent a moment, and then she seemed to shake off her graver feelings. "Let us go on with our play-acting, Sir Squire. Now tell me what I am, a woman of quality or a scullery wench, a playactress or an orange girl?"

"I must see your hands first," said Benedict. He had forgotten all danger; forgotten that even then men were searching for him. Neither had he noticed that the fog had nearly lifted.

She fumbled with her hands a moment, as if in doubt, then she extended them both. There could be no doubt about it, they were coarsened by labor, and yet the hands of a queen could not be more beautifully shaped. The fingers were slim, and her nails pink and well-shaped. They were the hands of a lady, and they might be the hands of a scullery maid.

"Now tell me," she said. "Tell me, Master Wiseacre. What am I, maid of quality, or a kitchen wench?"

"Neither."

The word was on Benedict Trelawney's lips, but he did not utter it. She might be either, and yet he could not make up his mind. If she were a lady born, whence the coarsened hands, the signs of menial labor. If she were a kitchen wench, how could she speak such pure English, whence came the appearance of authority. How could a low-born maid speak to Benedict Trelawney — she had mentioned his name—as though she were his equal?

Her mood changed again.

"Now, Master Wiseacre," she laughed, "tell me, or you will be captured and taken to prison before you have made up your mind. Hark, don't you hear the hue and cry? Now tell me what I am."

"God meant you for a lady," said Benedict Trelawney, "but man has tried to make you a kitchen wench. Nay, I will tell you. You are the daughter of a noble family that hath fallen upon evil times. You have inherited all, and learnt all that becomes a gentlewoman, but because fortune hath been hard on you, you have to do a serving-woman's work."

At this she became silent again.

"Am I not right?" said Benedict Trelawney.

"Since you know, it is enough," she replied; "but tell me what you will do to-night?"

"I shall seek out some tavern, and sleep there," replied Trelawney.

"But my Lord Jeffreys will have every tavern in London searched."

The Mission Printing Force at Inhambane, Africa

and much other matter." Of the native village or settlement of Malahisa, he writes: "For twenty years we have longed to found a station there. It is in the direct line and highway to the south." Of King Bonapandhla and his "latest wife" (whose portraits he sends), the missionary writes: "This king is after Solomon somewhat, though he is rather short in the matter of wives. He has some fifty or sixty; he does not know how many, and the one who sits by him is the latest he has acquired. She is 'Queen of the May' to-day; but to-morrow she may be set aside like a tiresome toy, and he will promenade the village with a new one. He is very active in his opposition to religion. He publicly whips any preacher who comes to his village."

One of the photographs shows a native festival at the king's kraal, the music and dancing being of the same kind that has been in vogue in that part of Africa for centuries. Another picture shows a band of players performing on the rude native "pianos"—odd-looking instruments, which consist of a series of inflated skins of various sizes, which sound like drums.

By a late mail, letters from a number of missionaries in Africa have been received, which contain most interesting reports of the progress of Gospel work and child adoption and training in Liberia, Zambesia, and other missionary territory. Mrs. J. B. Robertson, of the Sinoe River Industrial Mission, Liberia, writes: "We have four girls and sixteen boys in our Mission House." One little lad, named Paul, was poisoned by his relatives, who opposed his acceptance of the Christian faith. Some of the adopted native children at various stations are named below:

TURNING A NEW LEAF

dealers or the pawn-shop, and the few dollars received for the sacrifice went for drink. 'Did he not try to stop?' you ask. Yes, he tried. In his sober moments—they came with horror in the darkness of the night and when the rain was on the roof—and white-faced Mary and the sick child beside him—sobbing in their sleep—he prayed for strength, and made resolutions for a better life; but all in vain, for with the dawn came the thirst demon and dragged him away.

"Then Mary took to sewing shirts, for she and the baby must live; but Donald saw that in so doing she was sewing in reality shrouds for herself and the child. One New Year's night he came home more sober than usual, for he had met no treating friends that day. He found Mary in their single dingy room, kneeling beside the child; but at sight of him she sprang up and kissed him, and made him some supper. Where did she get the money? A glance at her thin, left hand showed the absence of the wedding-ring, and then Donald Nelson, the last spark of pride fanned to a glow, fell on his knees, and cried out: 'Forgive me; oh, my wife! Oh, God help me—help me to turn over a new leaf!'"

At this point in the story Mrs. Forbes bowed her head; there were tears on her long, dark lashes, and she revolved the wedding-ring more rapidly than before.

"And did Donald Nelson turn over a new leaf?" asked Clara.

"Yes, my child; but oh the struggle up, the backward sliding, the heart agony, the blood-sweating of it all! The very next day he found work, and with Mary's love and a growing strength that was not his own, he again took up an honest man's life battle.

"Three more years, and the old position was won back; and heaven sent a baby daughter to bless their home. Each succeeding New Year saw the turning of a cleaner and more promising leaf. And now Donald Nelson is at the head of the great works, and it is thought he will, in time, become a partner. But oh, the greater partner—Mary and her love!"

Allen Forbes bent down, and took in his the little hand with the wedding-ring; but the children did not see the tear that fell on it, for just then the clock began to whirr and to strike the death-knell of the dying year, and the welcome to the new.

All rose to salute each other and to greet the New Year. Allen Forbes drew his wife nearer to him, and from the chimes in the steeple of the great church there pealed out the melody:

Nearer, my God, to thee.

More Queries for the Question Box And the Answers by Dr. O'Hanlon

40 Will God forgive a man if he comes back to him the second time, in faith believing?

Yes. Hosea 14: 4. Also Peter's restoration: He wept bitterly, Matt. 26: 75; Mark 14:72; Luke 22: 62; John 21: 15, 16, 17. I think your difficulty lies in your imperfect repentance—when repentance of sin is complete, saving faith in our Lord becomes easy, otherwise it is impossible. Matt. 5: 23, 24, 29, 30. James 2: 17, 20, 26. Matt. 11: 28, 29, 30.

41 What is it to be saved?

He that believeth in Jesus Christ and is baptized, shall be saved, Mark 16: 16; 1: 15. Saving faith in our Divine Lord carries with it repentance and pardon, and also spiritual regeneration on the new birth. John 3: 3, 5; Acts 20: 21; Gal. 6: 15; II Cor. 5: 17. Also the assurance of pardon and reconciliation with God. Romans 8: 14, 15, 16; I John 5: 10.

42 If a man does not believe there is a God, how can you make him believe?

No man can be an Atheist all the time—in spite of himself, at times he believes in, and fears a Supreme Being, for God has made him so. Even the devils believe in God and tremble, James 2: 19. This partial belief in God, common to all men, is sufficient basis for prayer. If this man will pray for a larger faith in God, his prayer shall be answered.

43 If a man does not experience any unusual feeling at his conversion, how does he know God has accepted him, and forgiven his past sins?

The Holy Spirit will give him this knowledge. John 14: 21, 26; 16:7-13; Romans 8: 14-17.

44 I find in the Bible, "And these signs shall follow those who believe: they shall drink poison and it shall not hurt them, etc." Tell me what this means if it does not mean what it says? Is this also "figurative"?

It means what it says; but these signs or miracles were to be confined to the Apostolic Age; for they were needed as evidence in the kindergarten period of Christianity, but not now, for Christianity shines in its own light.

45 What steadies a man's belief in God when he is weak?

Prayer, reading God's Word, counsel and companionship with good men, and especially is he to hold on to God, to worship God, and to engage immediately in the service of God. He that improves what he has shall have abundance. Matt. 13: 12.

46 What kind of a world is it when a minister will not consent to sit in the drawing room with his hired man, as he would with a "social equal," and yet he will undoubtedly say, if the servant happens to be dying, "Good by, John; I hope I'll meet you in heaven."

Social equality depends on more than religion. In religious equality all persons are on the same plane: here "the rich and the poor meet together, the Lord is the maker of them all." Prov. 22: 2.

47 Should a man who has given himself up to God, shun and keep away from his old associates in wickedness, or should he meet them—which means temptation—and try to convert them?

"Self preservation is the first law of nature." It applies as well in religion. As far as possible, separate yourself from old associates in wickedness, and from your old haunts of sin. After a while you will be stronger. Matt. 26: 41; 9: 16, 17.

48 Why were we required to take on this state of imperfection? (By the will of God?)

Man is a free moral agent, has the power of choice between good and evil, is therefore exposed to great evil; but if he chooses the good, he will be elevated to great character and glorious destiny. I. John 5: 4, 5; Rev. 2: 7, 11, 17, 26; 3: 5, 12, 21; 21: 7.

49 Why is the suffering on the part of men that are trying to do right and can't get on, permitted?

To develop character in this world, and to attain the highest possible glory in the world to come. II. Cor. 4: 17, 18; James 1: 4; Rev. 7: 14, 15, 16, 17.

50 Am I to believe that after this life there is a better place? Where is it?

Yes. Where Christ is, Acts 7: 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60; John 14: 1, 2, 3, 4. Its exact location is a matter of small import, the glorious fact is of surpassing significance.

51 One of my most easily besetting sins is, hard thoughts against my relatives. Be good enough to advise me.

Hard thoughts are greatly softened by words and deeds of kindness to those whom we dislike. "A soft answer turneth away wrath," Prov. 15: 1. Act towards them as though you had no hard thought against them, and the hard thoughts will weaken and die. "Overcome evil with good." Romans 12: 21.

How 102,000 Came to Christ

weeks in a place, but meetings were held for nearly four months in Liverpool and five months in London. For the most part, there was nothing altogether new in the methods used. In the afternoon meetings, for four solid weeks there was systematic instruction of the people in Bible doctrine. The evening meetings were evangelistic. At the noon hour, meetings were held for business men. These business men's meetings were perhaps the most distinctive feature of our work. At them were gathered together leading men in commercial and professional life. The great burning problems of the day regarding faith and unbelief, agnosticism, infidelity and atheism, the inspiration and authority of the Bible, the existence of God and man's duty to God and to his fellow-man and to Jesus Christ were discussed. These meetings were perhaps the most enthusiastic of any, unless it be the Sunday evening meetings for men only. At these Sunday evening meetings for men, from five thousand to eleven thousand men would gather together to listen to straight Gospel sermons, and oftentimes hundreds of men in a single night would make a public profession of their acceptance of Christ. These men came from all classes, from hard-handed working men, up to members of the nobility, lawyers, physicians, university students, newspaper men, actors, music hall entertainers, soldiers, officers, policemen, drunkards, gamblers, thieves, rakes, forgers—literally all classes of male society were represented among those who gave credible evidence of a real acceptance of Jesus Christ.

Perhaps the most constant criticism made upon the meetings, and one for which there was considerable justification, was that the "emotional element," and the "wooing note" were unduly absent. If this was a defect, I think it accounts, in measure at least, for the uncommonly large number of men, especially hard-headed men, who were converted.

Notwithstanding the large number of professed conversions, there are many who think that the more important results were in the effect of the missions upon ministers, churches and individual believers. It is not too much to say that many churches were simply transformed; dead churches were quickened into new life; new churches and missions and other religious institutions have been organized, buildings have been erected, many have begun to prepare for the ministry, quite a number have offered themselves for foreign missions, and large gifts were made to foreign missions and other philanthropic movements.

All this has come to pass, not through the preaching of any new Gospel, nor through the application of the old Gospel by any startlingly new methods, but simply by the preaching and singing of the old Gospel in the old way in the old-time power.

Turning to God*

WHEN men turn to God in our time, they have to contend with difficulties, different in form but identical in principle, with those that confronted those ancient people whom Samuel addressed in the words associated with the Topic. Not that they would prostrate themselves before the grotesque images which symbolized the heathen deities, but that they still reverence other things with a more complete submission than they give to God. What is it that fills the heart, monopolizes the thoughts, commands the most strenuous endeavor? That is our idol, by whatever name it is known. When an employee or a business man is placed in a crisis in which he must lose his position and his property, or disobey his conscience and consciously displease God, he shows by his decision whether God or these other things are supreme in his life. Many a man who would loathe the worship of the Ashtaroth, that these Israelites reverenced, is held back from consecration and Christian service by an attachment to a worldly woman, whom he cannot give up even to please God. Thus we are not so far removed from those old-time people as we might suppose. The question comes to us, as it came to them, Is God the supreme Ruler in conduct and life? Until we can honestly say that he is, we have not turned to God.

Human nature may be developed and civilized, educated and refined, but the crucial elements are not changed by these influences. Do we wish to turn to God? Then all that is antagonistic to him must be resolutely put away. But this does not involve fanaticism. There have been men who have given away all their possessions and become poor, under the mistaken idea that God required the sacrifice of them. God's demand is for the first place in our hearts, but not that we should exclude from them natural affections or natural desires. It is only when we raise those affections and desires to a higher place than belongs to them, that we become idolaters. There is no desire so strong in men as the preservation of life. We are justified in defending ourselves from attack and resisting anything that menaces life. Yet, if as it happened in the Indian Mutiny, and more recently in China, the alternative is forced on the Christian that he abjure Christ or give up his life, it is his duty to choose death, as many did. To die, to give up position or property, to part with a beloved friend, to lose anything and everything rather than to offend God, that is to give him the rightful place in our hearts and lives. Only when we do this, when we are ready at all times to do this do we really turn to God.

*Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society for Jan. 7, 1906. I. Samuel 7: 3-6.

The One Foundation*

IN all denominations there is at this time a tendency of good augury, to turn to the teaching of Christ as the supreme rule of life and thought. The emphasis that Luther and Calvin placed on the Pauline epistles, was necessary in their day to bring the church to a better understanding of the principles of Christianity. There was need of clearer dogma, of better organization, of deliverance from priestcraft, and the reformers found in the epistles to the early churches, the models they needed and the creeds that had been overgrown and ignored. But now there has come a change. Men are turning back to Christ, and are laying more stress on personal love and loyalty to him than on the things that were said about him. It is important that we should have right views of his nature and his origin, but it is still more important that we should be true to him and make his teaching the rule of our lives. This is the foundation, and other than this, as the basis of our Christian life, can no man lay.

The word that Christ spoke as he called his disciples, is the word that is now ringing through the churches: "Follow me," and it is in following him that we find our way into all truth. We learn from him that God is not the austere, distant sovereign that men supposed him to be, but is the loving Father present in his world and working to bring his children into accord with his will. We have learned from him that it is not a change of creed that men require so much as a change of character; that the loving, kindly soul is likest God and is his child; and that to be a Christian it is necessary to be like Christ and to continue his work in the world. To follow Christ, to love him above all things, to be loyal to him—that under any name is to be a Christian. What a change that view of him has made in the world! It is the foundation of morality, of theology, of charity, of brotherhood—everything that ennobles and elevates humanity is built on that foundation and grows from that root. And the end is not yet, the new impetus Christianity has received from this approach will continue till all the world has become Christian.

*Topic of the Epworth League for Jan. 7, 1906. Isa. 28: 6; I. Peter 2: 4-7; I. Cor. 3: 11; Eph. 2: 19, 20; II. Timothy 2: 19; Luke 6: 46-49.

THE LAST HOURS OF A SAINT

MANY readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have been interested in the accounts of the life and work of the aged Mrs. O. M. FitzGerald, which have appeared in these columns. Mrs. FitzGerald, who passed away on November 17, at her home in Newark, N. J., had been an invalid for many years. Notwithstanding increasing infirmities, due to her great age, she continued, almost to the very last, her lifelong activities in many lines of Christian work, notably in missions, in Holiness meetings, and in the annual camp-meetings at Mount Tabor.

Her last days, passed in great suffering, were marked by the most beautiful Christian fortitude. On September 29, she returned from Mount Tabor to Newark, and was carried from the coach to her rooms, which she never left afterward. She was as helpless as an infant, but even amid her physical weakness she showed a faith that was strong and unshaken. A friend who was with her during those last days said:

"Death had no terrors for her; in fact, she welcomed it as a kindly messenger with good news from the heavenly home. While still able to speak, she conversed with the family and attendants, giving spiritual counsel. Her last audible words, spoken during a paroxysm of great pain, were, 'Jesus, call me up.'"

Mrs. FitzGerald was the mother of Bishop J. N. FitzGerald, of the M. E. Church, who for several years past has had special charge of the great Ocean Grove Camp-meeting. Before her last illness, she told an intimate friend that she had read the New Testament over one hundred times and the Old Testament ninety-eight times.

New Year's—1906*

Remember, you have but one life to give:
Each day you can add to it, good or bad:
Sin affects both our spiritual and temporal welfare:
Onward and Upward should be the motto of every Christian:
Let not the lures along Life's pathway lure you:
Unless you keep the Commandments, life will be a struggle:
Try giving pleasure to others, and note the result to yourself:
Inspire kindness in others by example, not words:
Our greatest debt of honor is to ourselves:
Never neglect an opportunity to do good:
Sabbath observance should be a pleasure, not a task.

The Loss of the Lightship

THE recent storm that raged up and down our Atlantic coast, ripping the craigs from the headlands, sweeping away shoals and bars, and sending brave ships to the dark and weed-bound locker of Davy Jones, was the occasion of many a hair-breadth escape and daring rescue, such as appear more often on the pages of Cooper's Sea Tales and in the stories of Capt. Marryat, than in real life.

The Lightship Sinking on Nantucket Shoal

The Nantucket Shoals Lightship was one of those that foundered, her crew fortunately being taken off but a few moments before she plunged. On Sunday night, the tenth of this month, a wireless message came ashore from the lightship, giving the news that she was leaking badly and liable to sink within a few hours. The crew were helpless, as no boat could live five minutes in the sea then running.

For two days the ship rode the storm, while the crew manned the pumps and fought for their lives against what seemed inevitable destruction. Through the black night, every few moments, would come a "comber," white with foam, breaking over the vessel from stem to stern, and she would settle a little lower at her anchorage. The United States gunboat Wasp was sent to the rescue, but went ashore on the great shoal that reaches outward from the island of Nantucket. Hope had been almost abandoned by the crew of the lightship, when the lighthouse tender Azalia, of New Bedford, was seen ploughing her way through the waves, that seemed to watchers ready to engulf her. The men on the tender put on utmost pressure to get her there in time. The crew was taken off, but nothing, of course, could be done for the vessel. Lower and lower she went until, with a swift plunge, she pointed to the bottom, and left but a swirl of foam to mark the resting-place of the famous old ship that has stood sentinel so long over the dangerous shoal of Nantucket, a warning to thousands of mariners who have their lives in their hands when they sail that wintry coast.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Contrite Hearts. By Herman Bernstein. In a prefatory note, the author says: "In this story of the Jews, I have striven to present the life I know, with frankness and in the simplest terms at my command." An interesting story of Jewish family and religious life in the Old World, finally transferred to the New. The struggle between paternal love and religious devotion is shown in the strong character of Israel, the Hebrew Teacher and Reader of the Law, who disowns his beloved daughter, Esther, whom he turns out of doors in the storm because of her acknowledged love for Bobrovsky, the apostate. Published by A. Wessels Company, New York. Price $1.25.

History of the United States, by Mary Ford. This little volume is published in the series known as the Children's Library. The story of our country, from the days before Columbus to the present, is told with all essential facts and in a manner to interest and instruct young readers. The arrangement of the index is to be commended. The History of England, by Mrs. Frederick Bonz, in the same series, is equally well written, and gives the main facts of the history and life of the people to whom we owe our language and laws. Cloth covers, 220 pp. Price 75 cents each. Thomas Whittaker, Bible House, New York, publishers.

Fair Margaret, A Portrait, by F. Marion Crawford. The writer of the famous Saracenisca series has taken Paris as the setting of this fascinating story, and a young lady with musical aspirations, a young writer, a Greek financier, and a famous opera singer as his characters. The plot deals with the various difficulties encountered by the young woman on her path towards a musical career in Paris, ending with her triumphant debut. Its sparkling dialogue and clever estimates of character will make it, without doubt, one of the successes of the year. Cloth covers; 383 pp. Price $1.50. The Macmillan Co., New York, publishers.

An Observer in the Philippines, by Rev. John Bancroft Devins, with Foreword by Hon. W. H. Taft, Secretary of War. This is perhaps the most comprehensive and satisfactory work that has yet appeared on this subject. Dr. Devins is a careful and thorough observer, and a painstaking investigator, and his book sheds a flood of light on a topic concerning which but little that is trustworthy has been known to the American people. Pp. 416. Copiously illustrated. Cloth covers. Price $2.00. American Tract Society, New York, Boston and Chicago, publishers.

Recollections of a Confederate Staff Officer, by Gen. S. Moxley Sorrel. This is the most interesting series of reminiscences written by a Southerner that has been published for some time. Gen. Sorrel was Chief of Staff of Longstreet's First Army Corps, and many of the most stirring scenes of the Civil War were enacted within eyeshot and earshot of the writer. Such books as these, that tell of march, battle and bivouac are an almost necessary supplement to ordinary historical reading. Cloth covers, 315 pp. Price $2. The Neale Publishing Company, New York and Washington, publishers.

What is Christianity True? by E. Y. Mullins, D.D., President of the Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Ky. A book presenting in logical order the evidences from Jesus, the miracles and the resurrection; from Christian experience, from Christian history, and the test of usefulness. A valuable book for doubters, or for Christians who have to deal with doubters. Pp. 450. Price $1.50. Published by the Christian Culture Press, Chicago.

Divorce and Remarriage. By Will K. Osman. The author discusses the subjects of divorce and remarriage from what he terms the common-sense, the moral and the Scriptural standpoints, giving numerous quotations and examples. He does not stop with discussion, but makes definite suggestions as to the bettering of marriage and divorce laws. Published by Mayhew Publishing Company, Boston, Mass.

Torrey and Alexander, the story of a world-wide revival, by George T. B. Davis. This is a valuable record of the great spiritual campaign recently conducted by these evangelists throughout the world. Pp. 257, Illustrated, cloth covers. Price $1. Fleming H. Revell Co., New York, London and Toronto, publishers.

Lives and Stories Worth Remembering, by Grace H. Kupfer. This is in reality a supplementary reader, designed to give young people an idea of some of the masterpieces of literature, together with a good account of the writers. Cloth covers, 208 pp. American Book Company, New York and Chicago, publishers.

Successful Men of To-day and What they say of Success: Based on Facts and Opinions gathered from five hundred prominent men. By Wilbur F. Crafts, Ph.D. (Revised Edition). Pp. 297. Price $1. Published by The Funk & Wagnalls Co., New York.

The Trial of Jesus, by Giovanni Rosadi. An Italian view of the life, teachings and death of our Lord. A signal proof that no one can touch that sublime character without bringing out of it something new. Pp. 335 Price $2.50. Published by Dodd, Mead & Co., New York.

For Each Day a Prayer. Selected and arranged by Elisabeth Hamill Davis. Contains short prayers by Phillips Brooks, J. G. Holland, Longfellow, Browning, and many other eminent men. Pp. 271. Price $1.25. Published by the Dodge Publishing Co., New York.

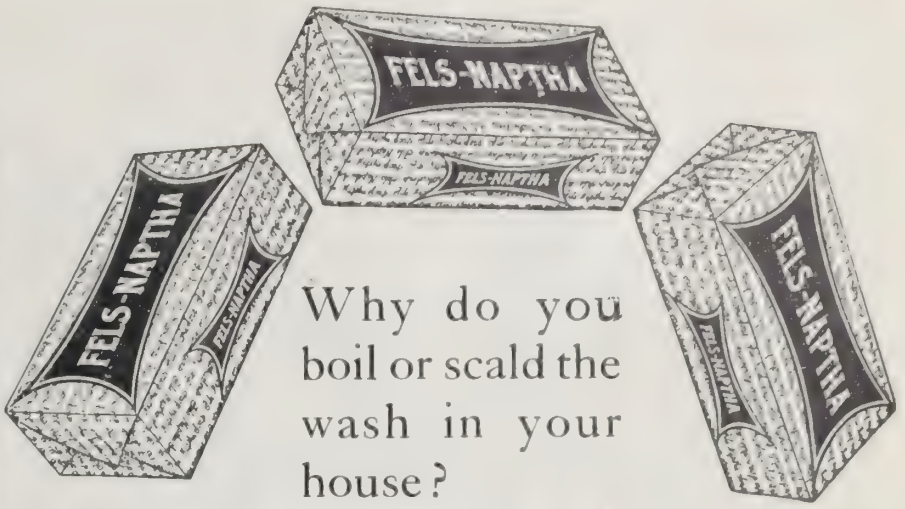
Daybreak in the Dark Continent, by Wilson S. Naylor, Professor of Biblical Literature in Lawrence University, a history of Christian Progress in Africa. Pp. 316. Published by the Young People's Missionary Movement, New York.

The Message of the Twelve Prophets. A study divided into twenty-eight weeks, of the essential teachings of the Minor Prophets. By William D. Murray. Pp. 197. Published by the International Committee of the Y. M. C. A., New York.

The Hidden Life. Thoughts on Communion with God, by Adolph Saphir. Pp. 291. Price 75 cents. Published by the Gospel Publishing House, New York.

Personally Conducted Tour to California

Exclusively first class tour under the auspices of the Tourist Department, Chicago, Union Pacific and North Western Line, leaves Chicago, Wednesday, February 7th, spending the disagreeable portions of February and March in the land of sunshine and flowers. $350.00 includes all expenses, railway fare, sleeping cars, meals in dining cars and hotel expense. Service first class in every respect. Itineraries and full particulars on application, S. A. Hutchinson, Manager, 212 Clark Street, and 120 Jackson Boulevard, Chicago.



Why do you boil or scald the wash in your house?

Do you think it kills the Germs?

Boiling does not kill germs. A heat of 280 degrees is necessary to do this, while boiling water is only 212 degrees. What boiling does is to send the nasty steam through the house carrying the germs with it.

Fels-Naptha soap is different from any other. No boiling or scalding with it. No hot water at all. Clothes last longer and the work is cut in half.

Another thing, boiling water rots the clothes, and that is the principal reason why they don't last longer.

We find that most people boil the clothes because it is a habit and for no other reason.

Why not do away with this expensive and disagreeable habit.

Fels-Naptha soap washes, cleanses and purifies all things beautifully, whether dainty, or coarse heavy things.

The actual work saved in washing and cleaning with Fels-Naptha soap amazes every woman who uses it right.

Directions are on the wrapper. Try it and prove it. Cost you no more than other soaps. At your grocers.

The President's Daughter Engaged

Congressman Nicholas Longworth

Copyright, 1904, by Pach Bros., N. Y.

Miss Alice Roosevelt

FOR the first time since 1874, the White House will be the scene of the wedding of a daughter of a President, Mr. and Mrs. Roosevelt having recently announced the engagement of Miss Alice Roosevelt to Representative Nicholas Longworth, of Cincinnati. The ceremony will occur on February seventeenth. Mr. Longworth has been a devoted suitor ever since he came to Washington, two years ago, and every one has awaited the result of his attentions to Miss Roosevelt with great interest. He was one of the party that accompanied Secretary Taft to the Philippines last summer, as was also Miss Roosevelt, and it was then rumored that an engagement existed. The bridegroom-elect is one of the youngest men in Congress and is very popular.

Several weddings have taken place in the Executive Mansion. The first daughter of a Chief Magistrate to be married there was Miss Monroe, in 1820.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

Mrs. R. C. B., Massachusetts. "When in great trouble and anxiety I called upon the Lord, and he has heard and answered me."

E. B., Ohio. "I know by experience that God does hear and answer prayer. He has been my guide in time of perplexity."

Mrs. G. G. W., Mississippi. "God has been my tower of strength for the past week, and has lifted a heavy burden from my heart."

M. H. C., New York. "My experience during many years leaves me no reason to doubt as to a prayer-hearing God. I fully believe in Matt. 21:22."

M. A. S., Iowa. "I wish to be a witness for God, who so graciously and lovingly cares for all who cast their care upon him and trust him in the darkest hour."

L. L. B., Michigan. "I thank Him for many and fuller answers than I had asked or hoped; also for not granting my wish every time, for his way has been and always is best."

Mrs. R. B. S., Connecticut. "I wish to acknowledge God's loving kindness in sending direct answer to my prayer. He is ever faithful and true, and always does what is best for us."

Mrs. S. H., Indian Territory. "I have found your 'Answered Prayer' column one of the most helpful features of your paper. I wish to acknowledge the answer to a prayer. I received more than I asked for."

B. M., Illinois. "I prayed earnestly, and God inclined his ear and answered my prayer. I acknowledge his loving kindness, not only for sending an answer to this special prayer, but for many others."

Mrs. E. S., Wisconsin. "I gladly acknowledge God's goodness in keeping a dear one from being deceived and defrauded farther, and in sending us needed help in answer to prayer. Answered prayers is the first place I turn to when THE CHRISTIAN HERALD comes."

Mrs. R. H. M. Virginia. "God has answered my prayers very definitely, and I wish to praise his name. I believe that the publication of 'Answered Prayers,' in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is one of the greatest helps and stimulants to believers. Personally my faith has been much strengthened and brightened by reading the glad experiences of the every-day Christian."

Constant Subscriber, Virginia, writes: "We can thankfully testify that the Lord has many times very definitely answered our prayers, and we believe it to be a very great help spiritually to join with others in asking blessings. I beg for the prayers of my fellow Christians, my husband and I now being face to face with a crisis in our lives."

John Vanderbilt, East Orange, N. J. "Our prayers should be absolutely unselfish. We should pray for others, as well as ourselves. I prayed earnestly, for many years, to be rid of nervous apprehension and sinful anxiety, and it is wonderful how, in answer to prayer, the physical means (involving an operation on the muscles of my eyes) was pointed out to me to attain the desired end, and how to-day I am substantially free from the unfortunate condition that existed three years ago."

Acknowledgments of answered prayers have also been received from C. H., Minnesota; W. A. S., Illinois; S. E. O., Gillett, Pa.; A. B. H., Painted Post, N. Y.; Mrs. John W., Newhome, Mo.; M. E., Baltimore Subscriber; Mrs. B. C. Y., Connecticut; F. L. L., Taylors, Tenn.; J. E. McC., Vancouver, B. C.; B. E., Cresbon, Ia.; M. E. W., Birmingham, Ala.; D. J. B., Breesport, N. Y.; J. B., South Lyon, Mich.; Miss E. B., Tonson, Ind.; Gracie F., New Lisbon, Wis.; L. R. F., Concord, N. H.; Mrs. Phebe A. H., Moorefield, Neb.; L. B., Escondido, Calif.; J. C. B., Oak, Neb.; E. C., Kentucky; Minnie S., Pennsylvania; Mrs. J. S. W., California; O. G. Y., Jesup, Ia.; J. W. Y., Princeton, Ill.; F. L. C., Rock, Mass.; Mrs. J. G., East Syracuse, N. Y.; Mrs. L. C. L., New York; C. E. S., Youngstown, N. Y.; M. S. C., New Haven, Conn.; M. A. B., Wolfboro, N. H.; E. S. B., Providence, R. I.; R. J., Texas; Miss Ellie S. W., Chambersburg, La.; Miss H., New York.

The Midnight Sun

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

WHY should such a revelation as the coming of the long-promised Messiah have been given just to shepherds, and shepherds who were so poor that they must accept nightwork? Why should not such a revelation have been made to those learned men who were able to inform Herod where the Christ, the Messiah, should be born? Alas! the reason is not far to seek, for when the wise men came to Jerusalem with the tidings of their star in the East, and asked the help of these sages as to the remainder of their journey, they could tell them where the Christ should be born, but there was not one of them who offered to accompany the magi, and so put to the proof the revelation which God had made to them. Satisfied with their Bible knowledge, which gave them a position as teachers, they possessed no soul-hunger.

It is a dreadful thing when the knowledge about God supersedes the craving of the spirit after God. It is a sign of death and not of life; and the clammy atmosphere of the abodes of the dead is the atmosphere which clings to such souls. "Blessed are they which hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled" (Matt. 5: 6). There may be as much intellectual self-gratification and self-glorification in the study of the Scriptures as in any other study, if the student comes to it as one who would master with his tiny intellect the eternal thoughts of God. It is he who comes as a child, to be taught by that which is greater than himself: as a sinner, to be saved by the word he reads; as a disciple, to learn how to follow; as a servant, at his Master's disposal for any service; as a member of the one body of Christ in touch with the Head, to seek and find his place, who is brought face to face with God in the Scriptures.

To the shepherds, the drawing near of God was a terror. The experiences of their forefathers under Mount Sinai, when they might not draw near to the presence of God lest they should die, God's words to Moses, "There shall no man see me and live" (Exodus 33: 20), and probably also the consciousness of their own sinfulness, in the light of the glory of God, made them afraid. But the angel said unto them, "Fear not, for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day in the city of David, a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord. And this shall be a sign unto you: ye shall find the Babe wrapped in swaddling clothes lying in a manger."

No doubt the scribes, the priests, the elders, all had their own ideas of how the Messiah would come. To them his coming would have a political aspect, and probably they expected one who would be a warrior, another Joshua or Gideon; or perhaps another Moses, whose power or wisdom would reinstate them in possession of the land which their sins had forfeited, and rid them of the hated yoke of Rome. But the lesson of repentance, which had been taught them by all the prophets, they ignored. God had indeed given promise after promise of a Messiah King, but he had also given call after call to his people to return to him, to acknowledge their iniquity, etc., and this they had not done, and Christ must first come as the One whom they would despise and reject; but who would die for the sins of the whole world.

But the shepherds were a simple people; they had no learning which they were afraid of having to sacrifice, no ideas which they were afraid to lose. God's chosen ones are the little ones who have no importance in their own eyes, and therefore are free from themselves to appreciate Him.

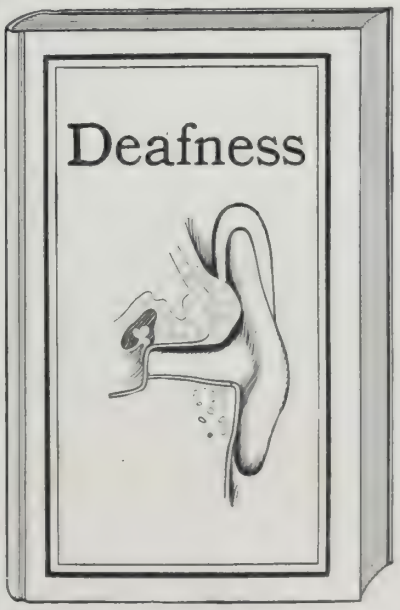
The "EAR-BOOK" For Deaf People

By George H. Wilson



SUPPOSE you knew a man who had been Deaf for twenty years?

Suppose you met him today, and found he could hear every whisper you spoke to him?

Suppose you enquired about him, and found that he was one of the most reliable, and responsible, citizens of Louisville, whose word could be absolutely trusted.

Wouldn't you want that man to tell you just how he got back his full Hearing after twenty years of Deafness?

Wouldn't you want to know some of the things he found out about the Ear, and about Deafness, in fifteen years study of both, and of his own case?

Well,—that is just what George H. Wilson of Louisville, Ky., tells in his 200 page "Ear Book."

Mr. Wilson is almost as well known in Louisville as Marshall Field is in Chicago, or John Wanamaker in Philadelphia.

And, he was, for twenty years, almost the Deafest man in his native city.

Any one of the thousands who know him today will certify that his Hearing is now as sharp as their own.

Few men have studied the Ear so earnestly, and thoroughly, as Mr. Wilson had to do, for his own sake.

What he positively knows about Deafness is personal and practical.

It is not mere book knowledge, but the actual facts tested out by his own hard experience.

"The Wilson Ear Book" therefore should be read by every man or woman, who has Ear trouble,—who is Deaf, or threatened with Deafness.

This "Ear Book" will be sent Free to any Doctor, or other person, who will clip out this advertisement and send us, with it, the name and address of one Deaf person in his locality. Address—

The Wilson E. D. Company,
178 Todd Building, Louisville, Ky.

The Right Flour

Surrounding the gluten and starch cells in the wheat berry there is a layer of almost pure white fibre. It is called cellulose and is as indigestible as sawdust. The presence of cellulose in flour cannot be detected except by special test. But it makes a difference in the moisture absorbing quality and so lessens the number of loaves to the sack. Some millers permit cellulose to go into their flour, but it is eliminated from GOLD MEDAL FLOUR by our special purifying process.
